THE BOOK

OF ECCLESIASTES.

THE name of this book is taken from the Septuagint, and is a Greek word signifying a preacher, or one who harangues a public congregation. The Hebrew name is Coheleth, which may either mean, the person who assembles the people, or he who addresses them when assembled. The book is generally ascribed to Solomon: and it can scarcely be doubted, but that the tradition of the Jews is well grounded; namely, that Solomon wrote it, when brought to deep repentance for the atrocious crimes into which he had been seduced by his idolatrous wives and concubines. Certain it is, either that Solomon was the writer; or that some other person wrote it as assuming his character: for many things in it are so peculiarly appropriate to Solomon, that no other man who ever lived could truly speak them. (i. 12. 16. ii. 4—10. vii. 25—28. xii. 9.) But it would be very absurd to suppose, that any inspired writer would use a feigned name and character. 'Grotius finds some words in this book, 'that are not to be met with at all, but in Daniel, and Ezra, and the Chaldee interpreters; which 'makes it probable, he thinks, that it was written after their captivity in Babylon. But supposing Solomon to write here as a penitent, after he had frequented the company of many outlandish 'women, (1 Kings xi. 1, 2;) it need not seem to us strange that he had learned the use of many of 'their words. Besides, in other books of Scripture there are words, for the signification of which 'we are fain to have resort unto other languages, and particularly the Arabic:—and yet for all 'that they might be pure Hebrew, according to the language which was then spoken.' (Bp. Patrick.) The nature of this book, which is properly a sermon on a special occasion, precludes the expectation of prophecies in it: nor is there any express quotation from or reference to it, in the other Scriptures, especially in the New-Testament, as far as I can recollect, or discover; yet, it is indisputable, that it formed a part of the sacred Canon in the time of our Lord; and the instruction it contains, when well understood, appears quite to coincide with the writings both of the prophets and apostles. Detached passages indeed, have been considered as containing unscriptural doctrine, and even such as leads to skepticism and licentiousness; and no doubt superficial and carnally-minded men, may "wrest them as they do the other Scriptures, to their own destruction:" but they all admit of a sound and useful interpretation, when accurately investigated, and when the general scope of the book is attended to. 'The tendency of this book is excellent, when rightly understood: and 'Solomon speaks in it with great clearness of the revealed truths of a future state, and universal 'judgment.' (Grey.)—It is evidently an inquiry after the chief good, or what can make man happy: an inquiry which the most learned, sagacious, and ingenious pagan philosophers, often made, but never could solve; but which the inspired preacher hath satisfactorily and finally settled, not merely by authority, or argument; but by the result of his own experiments. A more unexceptionable decision cannot be conceived, whether Solomon's greatness and prosperity, his wisdom and knowledge, or his advantages for making these experiments, and his assiduity in them, be considered. He had evidently two objects in view. First, to show where happiness could not be found: and secondly, where it might. 'Whatsoever is vain and perishing cannot make men happy. But all men's 'designs in this world are vain and perishing; therefore they cannot by prosecuting such designs 'make themselves happy.' 'That which can make a man's mind quiet, still, and calm, both in 'life and death; that alone can make him happy. Now this the fear of the Lord can do for him, and 'this alone: therefore this and nothing else can make him a happy man.' (Bp. Patrick.)—The first six chapters are principally employed on the former part of the argument; in which is shown the vanity of knowledge and wisdom, (apart from true religion,) of mirth and pleasure, of magnificence, prosperity, power, and wealth: yet, some counsels are here interspersed, tending to show how the vanity, at least the vexation, of each may be abated; and also intimations afforded, that wisdom is far preferable to all other acquisitions, and that a cheerful use of providential blessings is much better than covetousness. In the second part, from the end of the sixth chapter, the general object of the writer is gradually unfolded; and many important cautions and instructions are given, how to make the best of things as we find them, how to live comfortably and usefully in this evil world, and how to derive benefit from the changing events of life. Here indeed, the royal Preacher sometimes pauses, to show the vanity of the several things of which he has occasion to discourse: yet, this part is chiefly employed in teaching us where and how to seek present comfort and final happiness. In respect of outward things, the sacred writer inculcates a cheerful, liberal, and charitable use of them; without expecting to derive from them any permanent or satisfactory delight. Yet he counsels us to take the transient pleasure, which agreeable circumstances can afford: as far as consists with the fear of God, or true religion; to be patient under unavoidable evils; not to aim at perilous, arduous, or impracticable changes; to fill up the station allotted us in a peaceable, equitable, and prudent manner; to be contented, meek, and affectionate; to do good abundantly, and to persevere in so doing for the pleasure arising from it, and in expectation of a gracious recompense. These general rules are interspersed with warnings and counsels to princes and great men; and to subjects in respect of their rulers: nor can it be doubted, but that a great part of the vexation of human life is occasioned by the misconduct of men in these particulars. But the conclusion of the whole matter is this. "Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole of man:" and thus habitually prepare for death and judgment, which will surely and speedily arrive. In fact, it is evident, that Solomon shows the vanity and vexation of all those things from which idolatrous and apostate men seek happiness; in order to recommend the substantial blessings of true religion: and that, however some parts of his doctrine militate against the traditions of men, or the impositions of Antichrist; none of them, when fairly interpreted, and compared with the context, will be found inconsistent with the doctrines and precepts of Christ and his apostles.

CHAP. I.

The writer and subject of the book, 1, 2, The vanity of earthly things illustrated by the shortness of life; the restless motions of the sun, wind, and waters; the correspondent toil of man; and the want of satisfaction, or novelty, experienced in every thing, 3—11. The writer shows his royal authority, his pursuit of wisdom, and the vexation that he found in it, 12—18.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The word rendered preacher, has a feminine termination, though it is used both with a masculine and a feminine verb: but the connexion, in several places, confines the meaning of it to the speaker, and not the discourse. In its general meaning it signifies one who gathereth; that is, one that collects the people together into a congregation, in order to instruct them. As Solomon, in the preceding book, spake in the name of Wisdom, (which is feminine in the original;) it seems most obvious to consider him as speaking in the same or a similar character; if the feminine termination of the original word be at all regarded. The name of Solomon indeed is not mentioned in the book: but no other son of David reigned in Jerusalem over Israel; (12:) Solomon's successors were called kings of Judah, as distinguished from the kings of Israel, or of the revolted tribes; and many things in the book can suit none but Solomon. 'These are the words 'of him who thought the name of a preacher, or public 'instructor of God's people, no less honourable than that 'of the son of king David, whom he succeeded in his 'throne.' (Bp. Patrick.)—'Solomon is here called a 'preacher, or one that assembleth the people, because of 'his teaching the true knowledge of God; and how men 'ought to pass their life in this transitory world.'

V. 2. This abrupt proposal of his subject shows how full Solomon's heart was, and how desirous to impress the reader forcibly with it. He does not say, all things are vain: but that they are vanity in the abstract; yea, vanity of vanities, one complex vanity constituted of numberless vanities: and this he repeats, to show the certainty of it, and his assurance that the whole is unmixed vanity, and nothing else. All created good, abstracted from its connexion with the love and service of God, is unsuitable and insufficient to make us happy, or to do any thing effectual towards it: every enjoyment is unsatisfactory, uncertain, and transient: and there is nothing permanent or stable to be found. As God created them, all things were good, and suitable for the end that He intended: but as apostate man abuses and idolizes them, puts them out of their place, and expects that from them which is not in them, they prove empty, and vanish in disappointment and vexation. 'He condemns the opinions of all men, who set felicity 'in any thing but God alone; seeing that in this world all 'things are vanity and nothing.'

V. 3. "In all labour there is profit," whilst earthly things are subordinated to heavenly: but when a man disturbs that order, no solid good accrues to him from all his care and toil. The ambitious, the covetous, the sensual, nay, the studious, labour for a bubble, a shadow, a chimera, which soon vanishes and leaves them in darkness and despair.

V. 4—11. The earth indeed, and its productions and affairs, abide nearly the same through successive ages: but it is continually shifting its inhabitants: and what are they the better for all they possessed on earth, when swept away to make room for another generation? The swift approach of death, is alone sufficient to prove the vanity of a portion in this world. But the incessant motion of the sun, who yet is but where he was yesterday, or last year, at this time; the shifting of the wind from one point to another, and then back again; and the speedy current of the rivers to join the ocean, which yet is not filled with them, but returns them in various ways to water the earth, to feed the springs, and to supply the rivers, are so many emblems of man's restless state in this world; and lessons to him to spend his span of life in doing the will of his Creator, and in serving his generation. All things here are full of toil and labour, which man cannot describe, explain, or account for: and after all his labours, he is no nearer finding rest than the sun, the wind, or the current of the river; but is hastening to the dust whence he set out: and then his soul will find no rest, if he have not sought it in and from God. Nay, the eye, though wearied and worn out with seeing, and the ear with hearing, are not satisfied: every thing satiates the senses and appetites, and palls them with sameness and tedious repetition; and yet leaves them dissatisfied and craving. Thus men go on from age to age; we find the world the same as our ancestors did, and shall leave it the same to our posterity; and all the new inventions and discoveries that men boast of, are unreal or immaterial. Many things are deemed new through ignorance: men not being aware that the same truths were known, the same errors contended for, the same objects pursued, and the same plans adopted, in former ages, as at present. The learned often know this to be the case: and probably it would be found to be so in still more things, if the records of antiquity had not been lost or mutilated. In particular, he who is but moderately acquainted with ecclesiastical history, will scarcely find one modification of religious opinion, amidst the endless variety of modern days, which may not be matched with something of the same kind in ancient times. Upon the whole, it is the same scene over and over again: so that there is scarcely any thing of which it may be said, "See, this is new:" but it hath been already in old times; though there may be no remembrance of former things; and thus in like manner many modern inventions and conclusions will hereafter be exploded and forgotten. It is, however, certain that there is nothing new discovered, which can prevent the world from being that same vain vexatious place that it was found in former ages.

V. 12—18. After this exordium, the preacher proceeds to a more particular account of himself and his subjects. Being king over Israel in Jerusalem, he desired wisdom and knowledge, in order to a proper discharge of his high and important trust: and he applied himself heartily, and with all the powers of his capacious understanding, to learn every thing that had been done under heaven, as far as it was discoverable by him. For God hath so ordered it, that even knowledge must be acquired with sore labour and travail by the sons of men; which, however, tends to exercise and employ their minds in a salutary manner, and serves to humble them, as some render the words. Or the clause may mean, that Solomom searched out the nature and causes of that sore labour and travail, with which God exercises the children of men. The result of this inquiry, however, was, that when he had considered all the works done under the sun, he found them, not only to be vanity, but vexation of spirit: anxious cares and insipid pleasures ending in bitter disappointments. For no human power, sagacity, or industry can rectify the crookedness of men's dispositions and behaviour: or cure worldly enjoyments of their vanity; or supply, or even number up, those things which are wanting to felicity. These subjects Solomon pondered in his own mind with serious attention: and considering that he had both riches, authority, capacity, and leisure, he was determined to examine critically the different pursuits from which men expected happiness. And in the first place he purposed to examine the difference between the enjoyments of such as sought knowledge and studied the rules of prudence and natural wisdom, and the pleasures of those who lived at their ease, and minded nothing but sensual mirth and indulgence: which was generally deemed to be madness and folly, and yet had many advocates. But he found the very investigation of the subject to be vexatious; and he was convinced, that there was no solid satisfaction on either side. For even the pursuit of knowledge and wisdom only made distressing discoveries to him of man's wickedness and misery: so that the more he knew, the more he saw cause to lament and mourn; and at the same time the increase of knowledge rendered the mind more susceptible of painful feelings; and aggravated the guilt of him who continued impenitent. We must remember, that the wisdom which cometh from God, and leads to him, and which is the whole duty of man, is excepted from the general charge of vanity. And all other wisdom and knowledge, abstracted from their connexion with it, and subserviency to it, are indeed vain and vexatious.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

None are more capable of showing the evil and misery of sin, than they who have been very guilty, and then become deeply penitent: and they generally are very desirous to warn their fellow-sinners, and to call them also to repentance. In like manner, none are so well qualified to preach the vanity of worldly things, as they who have had an opportunity of giving them a full trial, and then renounce them all for the comforts of true religion: and if kings, whose examples proved them to be in earnest, would discourse on this topic to their subjects, they would be the most unexceptionable of all preachers; nor would it be any degradation to their characters, nay; in the judgment of angels, who "rejoice over one sinner that repent-"eth," they would then appear more truly honourable, than when heading victorious armies, haranguing assembled nobles, or seated on the throne of judgment. For to the calm reflection of a believer, who hath run the circuit of earthly good, and is brought back from his wanderings; and then from the verge of the eternal world looks round upon the crowds which throng the court, the city, the change, the theatre, what doth it all appear but vanity? Imperial sceptres, high-sounding titles, flattering panegyrics, renowned achievements, are as mere a vanity as the rest of the shadowy possessions and enjoyments of life. The whole is vanity of vanities, the vainest of vanities, and nothing more. If this world, in its present state, were all, it would not be worth living for: but what shall we say, when for the sake of such shadows, eternal happiness is forfeited and eternal misery deserved? "What "profit then have ungodly men of all their labour, which "they take under the sun?" As far as this world is concerned, we are sensible, that all former generations have laboured only for a grave. The present race of men are treading in their steps; soon the same observations will be made over us; and if we have our good things on earth, it had been better for us that we had never been born. If indeed, like the sun, we rejoice to run our course of duty, and make haste to fill up our measure of services to our generation, according to the will of God, and then seek our rest in him: the shortness of human life and the vanity of the world will be no loss to us. But if we seek our happiness, and attempt to take up our rest on earth, where all things are full of labour; we shall at last be but where we set out; all our toil and inquietude will be in vain, and we must then go and give an account of ourselves to God our Creator and Judge. We cannot alter this state of things, which is the effect of man's apostacy, and of the wrath of God against his sins; our wisdom therefore consists in accommodating ourselves to it; and in ceasing to expect satisfaction here, where every short-lived enjoyment either palls and nauseates through excess, or grows insipid through repetition. For no discovery has yet been made of any new source of pleasure or happiness,

CHAP. II.

Solomon shows, from his own experiments and reflections, the vanity and vexation of mirth, pleasure, riches, and magnificence, 1—11: of wisdom and knowledge, though far preferable to folly, 12—17; of the most successful labours of man; except as the things of the world are used in a proper manner, according to the will of God, and by his special gift, 18—22.

which is exempt from vanity and vexation: after all our boasted improvements, the world is the same discontented, disappointed place, that men complained of in former ages: and it will be the same when we are gone, or forgotten, like those former things of which there is no remembrance.

V. 12—18.

It behooves all men, as well as kings and preachers, to apply their hearts, and the abilities which God hath given them, to find out that wisdom and knowledge which is connected with their duties in the community. Yet in the present state of things, even this is a sore labour and travail: and the more we read, hear, or observe of all the works that are done under the sun, the more evil and misery we become acquainted with. We discover calamities, which we cannot relieve, errors which we cannot rectify, and vices which we cannot reform: besides those crooks in our own lot which we cannot straighten: and those obliquities in our dispositions, and manifold defects in our own characters, which we feel ourselves unable fully to remove. Communing with our own hearts on these subjects will serve the more deeply to convince us, that neither wealth, authority, nor wisdom, even if they exceeded those of Solomon, could alter these things. And it is madness and folly to expect that satisfaction from madness and folly, which wisdom and learning fail to confer on their disciples. Yet that libertines and epicures might have no plea left them; and that no man might be enticed by them to make the perilous experiment, in order to a decision of the question: we have it here made by Solomon, and to the greatest advantage; and, as might have been expected, he found it "vexation of spirit." Whilst at the same time he excludes the wise and learned from their boastings also; seeing, with all his unparalleled wisdom and knowledge, he assures us, "that in much wisdom is much grief, and "he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow." Let us then learn to hate and fear sin, the cause of all this vanity and misery; to value Jesus Christ, by whom we may return to God and happiness; to despise and renounce this vain world; and to seek our rest in the knowledge, love, and service of God our Saviour.

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. Solomon, having found learning with all its discoveries, to be labour, sorrow, and disappointment, deliberately proceeded to make trial of mirth and pleasure, in order to find out the happiest course of life. We may now, therefore, imagine him surrounded with the most witty, gay, and dissipated of his courtiers and subjects; and endeavouring to relax his mind, and dissipate his cares, by jollity and laughter. But he soon found this also to be vanity. Upon reflection he "said of laughter, it is "mad." For a rational creature to indulge in excessive mirth was a voluntary insanity, which rendered him for the time devoid of reason, and the object of pity or contempt, which betrayed him into foolish actions, and entailed on him many painful consequences. And what at last could this noisy flashy mirth do towards making a man happy? For on trial it was found to be little more than the affectation or hypocrisy of pleasure: a forced appearance of joy concealing an aching heart, and increasing its anguish and remorse when it subsided.

V. 3. The royal Preacher next devised to make a critical experiment of the pleasures of wine, which have been so much celebrated by licentious poets. He therefore determinated to indulge his sensual appetite, and see what it could do for him. But yet he acquainted himself with wisdom: either he devoted the former part of the day to study and business, and then indulged himself in the evening; or he conducted the experiment with wisdom, and did not disorder himself by running into great excesses; or he endeavoured to take his knowledge and wisdom along with him, (so to speak;) that he might estimate the degree of satisfaction to be found in drinking; thus attempting to lay hold on folly in a wise manner, and for a wise end, namely, that he might discover which of the pursuits of men was worthy of the decided preference, and ought for that reason to be adhered to all the days of man's life on earth.

6 I made me [o] pools of water, [p] to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees;

7 I got me [q] servants and maidens, [r] and had * servants born in my house; [s] also I had great possessions of great and small cattle, above all that were in Jerusalem before me;

8 I gathered me also [t] silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces; I gat me [u] men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as † musical instruments, and that of all sorts.

9 So [x] I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me.

10 And [y] whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them; I withheld not my heart from any joy; for [z] my heart rejoiced in all my labour: and this was my portion of all my labour.

11 Then [a] I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and [b] behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.

12 ¶ And [c] I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what can the man do that cometh after the king? ‡ even that which hath been already done.

13 Then [d] I saw § that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as [e] light excelleth darkness.

14 The [f] wise man's eyes are in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that [g] one event happeneth to them all.

15 Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth ‖ even to me; [h] and why was I then more wise? [i] Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity.

16 For [k] there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is, in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And [l] how dieth the wise man? as the fool.

17 Therefore [m] I hated life; because the [n] work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: [o] for all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

V. 6. The wood, &c. Or, the nurseries and plantations, in which all sorts of trees were raised. These Solomon, doubtless at vast expense, contrived to water in dry seasons, from pools, which at the same time seem to have been replenished with fish, and to have greatly added to the magnificence of the scene. These great works constituted his next experiment in pursuit of happiness; or in seeking after the chief good, about which the heathens had almost three hundred different opinions.

V. 8. Musical, &c. The original words thus translated are used in no other part of Scripture; and the meaning of them is much doubted. Some derive them from the verb which signifies to take captive. 'The delights of the 'sons of men, as a woman taken captive, and women 'taken captive.' (Old translation.) And though Solomon had no wars in the former part of his reign: yet, the number of women of different countries, which he had collected for wives and concubines, as conquerors generally selected the most beautiful captives for themselves, may perhaps be intended: for certainly that seems to have been one of his experiments, and as it was in itself the most dangerous and sinful, so it proved the most pernicious, of them all.

V. 9—11. Solomon made trial of all these pleasures and pursuits, without stupifying his faculties, or rendering himself unfit for business or serious studies. Though he dreadfully forsook the service of God, yet he did not neglect the affairs of his kingdom: nor was he bereaved of his wisdom, as Samson had been of his strength. Yet he freely indulged himself in every pleasure, and possessed himself of every object that his eye or his heart desired; having it in his power to compass all his wishes, and being determined to give every thing a fair trial. Whilst he was pursuing his schemes, he had indeed a momentary pleasure in beholding them advancing to their completion: but this was all! When they were finished the novelty was over, the sameness made them vain, his cares and disappointments rendered them vexatious, and all his improvements entirely failed of affording him satisfaction.

V. 12—17. In search of his grand object, Solomon next recurred to his design of comparing wisdom and knowledge with madness and folly, in order to discover which could do the most towards rendering man happy. He was sure that no one could repeat the experiment to better advantage than he; whether learning, wisdom, mirth, pleasure, magnificence, riches, or any other object were proposed, none could do more than repeat what the most renowned and prosperous king of Israel had done before him. Upon the deliberate survey, he found indeed that knowledge and prudence in affairs were preferable to ignorance and folly, even as light excelleth darkness. For the wise man goes about his work, as one whose eyes are open and fitted for their use, and who can distinguish the surrounding objects, and those at a distance: but the fool blunders on, as if he were blind or in the dark, and is continually doing mischief and running into trouble. Yet one event happeneth to them all. The wise cannot find solid happiness any more than the fool. As to the troubles

18 ¶ Yea, [p] I hated all my labour which I had * taken under the sun: because [q] I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me.

19 And [r] who knoweth whether he shall he a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself [s] wise under the sun. This is also vanity.

20 Therefore I went about [t] to cause my heart to despair of all the labour, which I took under the sun.

21 For there is a man, [u] whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he † leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil.

22 For what [x] hath man of all his labour, [y] and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun?

23 For [z] all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief: yea, [a] his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity.

24 There is [b] nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should ‡ make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, [c] that it was from the hand of God.

25 For [d] who can eat, or who else can hasten hereunto, more than I?

26 For God giveth to a man, that is good ◊ in his sight, [e] wisdom and knowledge, and joy: but [f] to the sinner he giveth travail, to gather and to heap up, that he may give to him that is good before God. This also is vanity and vexation of spirit.

and anxieties of life, and pain, sickness, and death, no wisdom or learning can ward them off; so that Solomon himself, in respect of the most important temporal concerns, was upon a level with his meanest subject; his wisdom and knowledge were in this view a mere vanity, and his labour in pursuing them seemed altogether lost. He observed also, that when a wise man died he was commonly forgotten or neglected, with his maxims, devices, and performances. So that if it was asked, "How dieth the "wise man?" It might be answered, "As the fool." These reflections rendered him weary of life and of all its employments: as he found every thing "to be vanity and "vexation." We suppose this to have been Solomon's experience, whilst he was seeking satisfaction in the world, and before he began to return back to God and his service.

V. 18—23. Solomon next considered what would become of his wealth, buildings, and improvements after his decease. He had indeed a son to succeed him in his kingdom, but who knew whether he would prove a wise man or a fool? and he seems to have perceived that Rehoboam was not likely to inherit his wisdom, or to preserve that prosperity in which he left his kingdom. Yet having rule over all his labour, in which he had showed his diligence and wisdom; he would have it in his power to overturn the whole. This reflection so disquieted his mind, that he desired to bring himself to despair of deriving good from all his labours, about those things, "which are under the sun:" seeing, that having bestowed great pains to establish the affairs of his kingdom in wisdom, knowledge, and equity, his successor, who entered upon it without any labour of his own, might destroy all by his neglect or imprudence. This Solomon saw to be a great evil in the affairs of men, which could not be rectified; by means of which, the incessant labour and care of man, by day and night, only produces proportionable sorrow and vexation. 'And yet, 'such is our folly, there is no end of our cares: for we see 'many a man whose life is nothing but a mere drudgery, 'who never is at leisure to enjoy any thing that he hath, 'but still engaged in one troublesome employment or other 'to get more: which he follows so eagerly, as if it were 'his business to vex and disquiet himself!' 'Not content 'with his daily toils, he racks his mind also with cares in 'the night! This is so void of all reason, that nothing can 'be imagined more vain and foolish!' (Bp. Patrick.)—"I went about to make mine heart abhor all the labour, "wherein I had travailed under the sun;" 'that I might 'seek the true felicity which is in God.'

V. 24—26. The result of these experiments of the preacher was this, that instead of ceaseless cares about getting and hoarding, nothing could be found under the sun, which deserved to be preferred to a cheerful and liberal use of the fruits of a man's labours. Yet even this was the gift of God; and without dependence on him, a man must be disappointed even here: for who could bestow more attention to it, or have more advantages for it, than he had possessed? and yet he missed of the comfort of his prosperity when he was wandering from God and his duty. But when a man is accepted of the Lord, and does that which he approves, he gives him true wisdom, knowledge, and joy; a peaceful conscience, a contented and thankful mind, a joyful hope, and solid satisfaction in the knowledge and love of him: and by teaching him to conduct his labours, and use his good things, in a pious, charitable, temperate, and sober manner, he enables him to rejoice in all the works of his hands, and in the abundance of good conferred on him. But to the sinner God allots labour and sorrow, vanity and vexation in seeking a worldly portion, which yet afterwards comes into better hands. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—17.

The manifold devices of men in order to derive satisfaction from the world, and their incessant changing from one

CHAP. III.

The mutability of human affairs, as resulting from the unsearchable, wise, and everlasting purposes of God, and connected with man's duty and interest, 1—15. The abuse commonly made of power, the future account to be rendered, and the way in which men live and thing to another, resemble the restlessness of one in a fever; who supposes his uneasiness to arise from his situation, though in fact it is the effect of his disease. If we could make full trial of every thing under the sun, and should determine to prove our hearts with mirth, and bid them enjoy pleasure in all its seducing forms; we should soon be constrained to say, "Behold this also is vanity!" The devotees of a gay and social life are themselves sensible of its emptiness. They cannot but feel, that immoderate laughter is a kind of madness, and "as to mirth, what doeth it?" They know, that frequently in the midst of their tumultuous joys their hearts are uneasy; and that their laughter is commonly succeeded by proportionable languor and dejection, and ends in disappointment, and often occasions them painful reflections in their short intervals of solitude. Nor can the pleasures of wine in the least prevent, nay, they will infallibly aggravate, these evils. Not to repeat what hath been said of excess of drinking; (Notes, &c. Prov. xxiii. 29—35;) even they who conduct their pleasures with more prudence and moderation, and pay some regard to health, reputation, and interest, whilst they "lay hold of folly;" will be miserably disappointed, if they expect to find in this indulgence "that good for the "sons of men which they should do under heaven, all "the days of their life." And if men have wealth, taste, and inclination; and can make trial of more expensive pursuits, (without injuring their circumstances, as many do;) they will find them also vanity and vexation. When the lower order in society behold the rich and noble making great works, building magnificent houses, laying out gardens, parks, and plantations, forming canals and fish-ponds, and whatever can be devised for luxury or embellishment; when they see them surrounded with a number of servants, possessed of large estates, and abundance of gold and silver, and collecting from every province its peculiar treasure, even all that is most curious, beautiful, and valuable, of statues, pictures, furniture, jewels, and whatever the eye can lust after, with musical instruments, (those delights of the sons of men,) to soothe the ear, and charm the mind; and when they see all this confluence of earthly good in the possession of one who neither runs into ruinous excess, nor yet withholds his heart from any joy, and who amidst all retains a reputation for wisdom, and manages his concerns with discretion: I say, when the poor witness such scenes, they can scarcely help mistaking this glare of prosperity for solid happiness; and they will be apt to covet, envy, and complain. But could they feel exactly as the possessor does, probably their envy might be turned into compassion. Thus when strangers take a transient survey of such scenes of magnificence, where every object excites admiration, they are apt to associate the idea of happiness with that of the possessor: when perhaps he is filled with vexation and disappointment, and receives not, during a course of years, half that pleasure from his magnificence that they enjoy in one hour. Indeed whilst the plans are forming, or the idea of increasing and supereminent greatness and renown float before the mind; and whilst improvements are making, and something new every day excites the attention, there is a degree of joy in a man's labour and success, and this he has for his fading portion. But when his designs are finished, and he vainly hopes to be repaid for all his trouble, care, and expense: he "looks "on all that his hands have wrought, and behold all is "vanity and vexation of spirit; so that there is no profit "under the sun." And if the richest, wisest, and most prosperous of kings could find nothing but vanity and vexation in all his possessions and enjoyments, what can any man do that cometh after him, and determines to repeat the same experiment! We must not indeed place mad mirth, intemperance, and folly upon a level with the liberal arts, useful learning, or economical or political wisdom. The former are evil in themselves, the others are good, except when misplaced, idolized, and abused. So that even this "wisdom excelleth folly as far as light "excelleth darkness." A man's knowledge and prudence, like the eyes in his head, preserve him from many temporal evils, into which he will fall, who walketh in darkness and ignorance; and they enable him to be respectable in, and useful to, the community. Yet in the grand concerns, one event happeneth to them both; the advantages of wisdom are precarious and transient; and the most sagacious of men, who dies a stranger to Jesus Christ, will perish equally with the most ignorant, and often with peculiar aggravations; so that this is vanity, and worse than vanity. And the imaginary advantage of being honoured after death is as uncertain as it is vain. Perhaps even Solomon, with all his glory, would have long since been forgotten, or his history distorted by fable, if he had not been made partaker of divine wisdom, and placed as king over God's people, and honoured as a writer of the sacred Scriptures. And what is this bubble, which so many covet and so few obtain? What good can commendations on earth do the body in the grave, or the soul in hell? And can the spirits of just men made perfect at all need them? It would indeed be as well, if there were in no case any remembrance of the wise man, more than of the fool, except as survivors are the better for his wisdom. So that, if this were all, we might be tempted to hate our life, with all the fruitless toil and work that is done under the sun; as "it is all vanity, and vexation of spirit."

V. 18—26.

One main pretence of worldly men, in excuse for their eager pursuits of vanity, is, that they are providing for their children: but this can afford a reflecting man no solid satisfaction; nay, indeed it must generally add to the vanity and vexation derived from other sources. For the uncertainty which there must be what use they will make of their riches, and whether they will behave wisely or foolishly, when they come to have much in their power; and the fears lest it should do them harm and not good, and multitudes by their means may make a worldly man hate all his labour under the sun. Soon it must all pass into other hands; who perhaps will subvert all his schemes, waste all his treasures, and destroy all those works in which he fancied that he had shown himself wise: nay, supposing he has laboured in wisdom, knowledge, and equity, to establish beneficial regulations, the man to whom he leaves it for a portion, perhaps overturns all by his vice and folly, before he is well cold in his grave. This is also vanity and a sore evil; enough to make a man cause his heart to despair of all his labour about worldly things. For what hath man of all his labour, and the vexation of his heart? for all his toilsome days and anxious nights, but sorrow and grief? Indeed worldly things were never intended for any thing more and better, than to supply our bodily wants, and our expectation of more from them is the main cause of this vanity. To eat and drink to the moderate satisfaction of our appetites is so far good; and there is nothing better for man, of earthly enjoyment: these, the animals share to greater advantage, but the rational soul requires some better portion. No wonder then, that when man mistakes this for his intended good, he is restless and dissatisfied, and prone to excess: so that he cannot attain to the comfortable use of the creatures, without the special gift of God: even though he had Solomon's wisdom and wealth, and hasted to it as much as he did. In order to attain this, and every other good, we must first seek and labour for those things which are above, and not for those under the sun: and having found acceptance with God, and being good in his sight, we shall receive from him wisdom and knowledge, productive of solid joy. Then we shall not have any cause to hate our life, or our labour, nor to sit down in despondency: but leaving our children, and all our concerns with the Lord, we may cheerfully attend to the duties of our station, pass through life without anxious cares; avoid much of its vanity and vexation, by the exercise of faith, patience, and joyful hope; and "abound in the work of the Lord, as knowing that our "labour shall not be in vain in the Lord." We shall not need to covet wealth or honour; but "having food and "raiment, shall learn to be therewith content," and to use what God giveth to his glory, with thankful hearts: and at length shall leave the world in a very different manner, either from the fool, or the worldly wise man. So that the vanity and vexation spoken of belongs only to men as sinners, and is confirmed to them as unbelievers; to the most prudent and prosperous of whom God giveth travail, as his portion: he toils and labours to gather and to heap up; and the real benefit of all his care and pains, and the sum total of all his enjoyment, even of this life, devolves "to "him that is good before God." "To all others there is "vanity and vexation;" but "to him that soweth right-"teousness shall be a sure reward."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—11. Solomon, having stated at the close of the preceding chapter, that a man should use cheerfully and piously the gifts of Providence, here proceeds to show, that he ought not to expect too much from them, seeing they are so fluctuating and uncertain. There is a season and a time for every one of God's purposes to take place in this lower world; and for us to perform the several parts of our duty, and prepare for the future: and we cannot anticipate or retard those appointed seasons, by any of our contrivances or labours. Thus there was a time, in the purposes of God, for our birth; and there is another for our death, known to him, but unknown to us. There are times, in which nations and families are planted and take root; and then there are means to be used, duties to be performed, and comforts to be shared: but there are also times in which God plucks up that which was planted, and no human wisdom can prevent it; and then we are called to the submission, and to the duties, of an afflicted state. In like manner he cuts off our dear friends or relatives, or heals us, or them, in his own time; he breaks down our established prosperity, or builds it up like a city recovered from its ashes; he calls us to weep and mourn, or to rejoice and dance for gladness; to raise trophies of victory, or to scatter the monuments of success under severe calamities, in his own time and manner. He also causes friends and relatives to meet in comfort, and with mutual endearments: at other times, they are either separated, or sorrow makes it seasonable for them to refrain from embracing, or circumstances call them to other duties. There are also times when men get wealth with ease, and keep it without difficulty: at other times, no prudence can preserve them from the most ruinous losses; nay, they will be glad to cast away all their wealth to save their lives. At some times men are called to rend their clothes in sorrow: at others to prepare the garments worn on joyful occasions: at some seasons awful afflictions stop their mouths; at others, unexpected deliverances open them to speak the praises of God, and to express the gladness of their hearts. At one time they meet with kindness, which excites their love: at another with injuries, which tempt them to resentment and hatred. So that nations experience times when they must wage war, as well as opportunities for the renewal of peace; nor can individuals at all seasons shun dispute and contention. To expect stable happiness in such an unstable world, must ensure disappointment. But to imitate the sailors, who keep the port in view all their voyage, and avail themselves of fine weather and fair winds; yet expect and prepare for storms and various hinderances and hardships, and accommodate their conduct to their circumstances, forms man's duty and wisdom in this changing world. Otherwise all his toil and labour will be vain and vexatious: and this God hath appointed to the fallen sons of men, for their discipline, correction, and humiliation. But, however this state of things may appear to us, every one of these dispensations is beautiful in its season: and when the whole plan of God shall be finished, it will appear to have been altogether wise, just, and good. Yet by reason of our situation in this world, about which our time and thoughts are so much taken up; no man can find out all the work that God maketh, from the beginning to the end: so that to us it will often appear disjointed and confused. Solomon here illustrates, 'The 'imperfection of human wisdom, which is confined to a 'certain season, for all things which it would effect; 'which if we neglect or let slip, all our contrivance signifies nothing. The perfection of our wisdom consists, 'first, in being contented in this order wherein God hath 'placed all things; and not disquieting ourselves about that 'which it is not in our power to remedy. Secondly, in 'taking the fittest opportunity of doing every thing, as the 'most certain means of tranquillity. Thirdly, in taking 'the comfort of what we have at present, and making a 'seasonable and legitimate use of it: and, lastly, in bearing the vicissitudes, which we find in all human affairs, 'with an equal mind.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 12—15. 'Wherefore long consideration and experience assure me, that leaving these fruitless inquiries 'and vexatious cares about the future, the only happiness 'that is in our power is to make the best of our present 'condition; being solicitous for nothing in this world, 'but to obtain good hope in God, by living piously and 'virtuously, and by doing good to others with what we 'have: and this not remissly and by fits, but seriously 'and constantly, as long as we live.' (Bp. Patrick.) Indeed the chief advantage of worldly possessions consists in the pleasure which arises from doing good with them, and in using moderately and cheerfully the fruit of our labour; which is the gift of God. It would be madness to think of altering the decrees of God: his appointments cannot be frustrated or disconcerted: nothing can be added to or taken from them; but they remain for ever as he hath purposed them: and he orders all things in that manner which is best suited to bring men to stand in awe of his power and wrath, and to reverence his glorious Majesty. There is also an uniformity in the vast variety of his dispensations; the same scenes are exhibited over again to successive generations; and God, as it were, recals those judgments and mercies which had been employed on former occasions. So that his dealings with individuals, and with collective bodies, from age to age, make the same displays of his divine perfections. 'It is a very great plague to be dis-'contented that things go otherwise than we desire: for 'certain it is, that God hath settled them by such an 'eternal and immutable law, that it is not in the power 'of man to make the least alteration.——Therefore, we 'must alter ourselves, and not murmur, that we cannot 'change the course of things; but be happy by reverent 'submission to the divine government; and a due care 'not to offend the divine Majesty; whose will shall be 'done one way or other; if not by us, yet upon us.—— 'For we are subject to no other laws, than those by which 'God hath governed the world from the beginning.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 16, 17. Solomon here more directly reverts to his subject, namely, the vanity of earthly distinctions or possessions. Men are very ambitious of power and authority, and these are deemed important acquisitions: yet they who obtain them commonly, more or less, abuse them; and instead of administering justice, are guilty of oppression and iniquity. And as God will surely call both the righteous and the wicked to an account for their works; so their exaltation frequently proves the occasion of their more aggravated condemnation: for as this is a time of the Lord's patience, speedily the time of his vengeance will arrive; seeing there is a time for every purpose and every work. In the mean while, however, the iniquity perpetrated under the colour of law and justice, exceedingly enhances the vanity of the world, by turning the principal outward remedy against misery into an engine of torture. And Solomon seems to have felt that even a wise and righteous prince could not prevent this: as he must leave so much to be done by others, and cannot secure, in general, the impartial execution of justice, however ardently he may desire it.

V. 18—21. Some think that these verses contain the objections of some infidels to Solomon's doctrine of the righteous judgment of God. But the construction requisite to make out this meaning appears to me perplexed. Solomon seems to have expressed the wish of his heart, concerning the estate of the sons of men, especially that of powerful oppressors, that God would manifest it unto them, and cause them duly to consider it; that they might perceive, that by choosing this world as their portion, they reduced themselves to a level with the beasts, without being like them exempted from present vexation and a future account. For that which befalleth the sons of men, respecting mere animal pleasures or pains, befalleth also beasts. Both live, and breathe, and die alike, and go to the same place, and return to the dust whence they were taken. So that, in these things, man hath no pre-eminence above the beast; for all is vanity. As none can fully comprehend, so, few consider properly, the difference between the rational soul of man, which after the death of the body returns to God, and enters upon an eternal state of happiness or misery; and the spirit, or life, of the beast, which is extinct with the body when it returns to the earth. And for want of attending to this, men forfeit their real and vast pre-eminence, and expose themselves to final and eternal misery.

V. 22. Wherefore, &c. In the midst of all this disappointment and vexation, the best thing that a man can do, is to "exercise himself to have a conscience void of "offence towards God and man;" returning to God through Jesus Christ, relying on his mercy, and rejoicing to do his duty. This will give him a humble confidence and a joyful hope, which is his present portion and the earnest of his future happiness. And he will not want to know, as indeed it would be vain to inquire of any one concerning, the things which are coming upon him, in the intervening years or days of his life.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In this changing world our proper comfort lies in the expectation of unchangeable happiness in heaven. How wretched then are they, who have nothing to hope, and every thing to fear, beyond the grave! In that world, to which the believer is hastening, there will be no more death or sickness, no more plucking up or breaking down, no weeping and mourning, no losing or scattering, no hatred, envy, or war; but eternal peace, and love, and joy complete, yet still receiving continual accessions. Whilst we continue on this stormy ocean, let us cast anchor within the vail: and let us seize the favourable opportunity for every good purpose and work. As the time for our being born is past, so the time for us to die is speedily approaching: in the interval there is a season allotted to us to work out our own salvation, and to do good to our brethren. If it had not been for sin, there would not have been a time for death; if it had not been for Christ, we must have died without hope. Our sins bring upon us all our personal, domestic, and public calamities; to Christ we owe all our comforts. Let us then learn to acknowledge the hand of God in all the varying scenes of life; to submit to his justice without murmuring, to humble ourselves for sin, to seek the supports of his grace, and to hope for returning comforts: if he please to pluck up, or to break down our prosperity, and to wither our gourds; if he call us to mourning and weeping, to rending our garments and girding ourselves with sackcloth; if he mar our enjoyments, bereave us of our substance, or expose us to embittered enemies. And on the other hand, if the Lord be pleased to plant, to build up, and to heal our wounds, to give us peace, and cause us to rejoice; if he send accessions of property or of kind friends, or render relative endearments comfortable to us: let us beware that we do not trust the transient calm; but in the day of prosperity let us prepare for adversity, in the time of love for enmity, in the time of peace for war, in the time of health for sickness, and in the time of life for death. In the mean while let us receive the present comfort with gratitude, and bear the transient affliction with patience: let us diligently attend to the duty, and accommodate ourselves to the circumstances of the present time; and expect our happiness, not from this changing world, but from an unchangeable God. But if we reverse this order, it will still recur to be inquired, "What profit hath he that worketh, "in that wherein he laboureth?" Nay, the more men see of the world around them, the more they will "witness "the travail which God hath given to the sons of men to "be exercised in it." Yet let us not rashly censure the appointments of God: every thing which he hath planned and executed, is perfectly fitted to its time, place, and occasion, and is beautiful in its season. But in such a world as this, where our needful employments are so many: and with such hearts as ours, which are so needlessly set upon and careful about earthly things, no wonder that we are not able to find out all the works of God, and to see the reasons and glory of them. To believe, obey, and submit, is our part on earth; and not, to comprehend the deep things of God. We should be daily occupied in doing good to all around us, as we have ability: and this would render our own temporal comforts doubly sweet to us: for indeed it is the only good in them. We should also avoid the extremes of avarice and extravagance, in the use of our substance; and should continually seek wisdom and grace from God, that we may properly "eat and drink, and enjoy the good "of all our labour;" without disquieting ourselves about the everlasting and most perfect appointments of God. Rather let us fear before him, and reverence his wisdom, justice, and power; being assured that he deals with all his creatures in every age by the same unerring rules. Leaving these matters therefore to the Lord, we should take the place, and do the work, assigned us. Nor need we desire eminent stations, which so often tempt men to atrocious wickedness, and expose them to severe judgments. And should we not only witness, but suffer from, iniquity being found in the place of judgment, we need not faint: for the time of deliverance for the oppressed, and for vengeance on the oppressor, will soon arrive. Rather let us pray for our poor besotted fellow-sinners around us, that the Lord would show them their real condition, and not leave them to their wickedness, as brute beasts that have no understanding. Surely the case of those who are so desirous of living like beasts, that the height of their hopes and wishes is, that they may die like them, is most deplorable. And yet must they be disappointed in this their grovelling expectation. Indeed, as to the body, there is no great difference at present; both must return to the dust. But who can describe the difference, when the soul of man leaves the body, and enters upon an eternal state of unmixed joy or sorrow; whilst the beast dies to live no more? Though we cannot fully explain this matter, yet, believing the word of God, we may know enough to convince us, that our business on earth is to seek future happiness; and embracing the salvation of the Gospel, to be zealous of, and rejoice in, all those good works which are the evidences of faith and love. If we choose this as our portion, we shall be safe for eternity: though no one can tell us what shall befall us hereafter during life; or what will come upon our family or country after we are gone.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—3. Solomon returned from his survey of the general condition of mankind, as in many things resembling that of the beasts that perish; to consider the case of the oppressed, who are rendered more wretched than the beasts by the cruelty of their oppressors. He had doubtless often had occasion to behold, and redress the oppressions committed in his own kingdom, by the rich and powerful on the poor servant and labourer, on the widow and the orphan. This led him to reflect on those who were crushed by more potent tyrants, and who were destitute of any comforter or helper; as none would dare to appear for them, lest they should share their injuries from that power which was employed to commit and maintain injustice. This view of human misery made him ready to conclude, that it was better to die than to live in such a wretched world; nay, that it would have been better never to have been born, to witness and experience the afflictions which arise from man's wickedness all over the earth. And so doubtless it would, if it were not for the comforts of religion and the hope of a better world; which the preacher all along meant to except from his general charge of vanity.

4 ¶ Again, I considered all travail, and * every right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbour. [h] This is also vanity and vexation of spirit.

V. 4—6. Turning his thoughts another way, Solomon next considered the labour and pains which men take in useful undertakings, and in rendering important services to mankind. Thus they often become renowned, eminent, and prosperous: but then this excites envy and opposition, the effects of which more than counterbalance all the temporal advantages of their right work. (Note, Prov. xxvii. 4.) Others, seeing the vexation which they meet with in an active course, foolishly expect to find more satisfaction in sloth and inactivity. Thus their strength and faculties lie dormant, and they often reduce themselves to pining distress: and yet some of them will assume an air of wisdom, and urge, that "Better is a handful with quietness, "than both hands full with travail and vexation of spirit;" which, though true of him who prefers quietness in doing his duty with a narrower income, to greater abundance with contention; yet applies not to the case of the sluggard. His quietness is a mortal disease both of body and soul; his hand full is wretched and wilful poverty; and any honest labour, or cumbersome plenty, is better than his quietness and starving. 'Pride, ambition, emulation, 'envy, and hatred reign so uncontrollably among all or-'ders and ranks, all trades and professions; that when a 'man has taken a deal of honest pains, in some useful 'work, and brought it to perfection: instead of gaining 'credit by it, his neighbours look awry at him; nay, he 'is disparaged and traduced by those who cannot or will 'not imitate, (but only carp at,) his ingenious labours.'—'Some are so absurdly foolish, as to sit down in perfect 'idleness.' 'A wise resolution this! to do nothing be-'cause others do ill!' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 7, 8. Solomon next considered the case of one that went into the opposite extreme. A single man, without any associate, for fear of the expenses of a family; one who not only has no children, but is without any near relation; and who yet toils and labours incessantly all his days; who is full of ease about scraping together and hoarding riches; who grows griping and penurious as he becomes wealthy and old; who lives in the meanest manner, and yet grudges himself every morsel, bereaving his soul of good; and who has not sense to ask himself, for whom he thus labours and starves? to whom it does not occur to inquire, 'Whose slave am I, seeing I work and 'fare so hard? and who is to reap the fruit of all my toil, 'and penuriousness?' The distant relations, or strangers, who inherit such a man's wealth, never thank him for it; for they know that he would not leave it to them, if he could keep it any longer.

V. 9—12. From the folly and misery of the solitary miser, the wise man takes occasion to point out the advantages of friendship, or marriage, and a social life. Two may live more comfortably together, if suitably paired, than one can alone; and their satisfaction in each other's company will be a good reward for the additional labour that it may occasion: for surely he has more satisfaction in life, who labours hard to maintain a wife and children whom he loves, than the miser has in his absurd care and toil! and every kind of honest and faithful friendship is productive of some solace, amidst the evils of life. This proposition is illustrated by some familiar cases. If a man travel alone, and any accident befal him, he may be lost for want of help; but when two journey together, the one is at hand to help and take care of the other. When two lie together, they communicate heat to each other; but either of them alone might have been incommoded by the cold. And two, or more, united together, may withstand an assailant, who would have prevailed against either of them separately; even as a three-fold, or twisted, cord is not readily broken, except by untwisting it. This is applicable both to the benefits of common friendship, and to the communion of the saints. 'Lamentable is the con-'dition of him who hath no friend or companion to 'reach out a charitable hand to him, when he falls, sup-'pose into a pit; none to comfort him when he is sick; 'none to testify to his innocence when he is defamed; or, 'which is worse, to restore him, when, by his own impru-'dence and negligence, he falls into sin.' (Bp. Patrick.) proceeded to show the vanity of royal dignity. Frequently they, who should be most revered for authority and seniority, are very ignorant and imprudent; yet are too proud to be admonished or counselled: and thus they involve themselves and their people in great calamities. But a nation had better be governed by one of mean extraction, and in his youth, who is wise enough to take advice and prefer good counsel; than by such an old and foolish king. Or rather, a poor youth, who behaves prudently, is more respectable and happy than he. Wisdom indeed may bring a man even from a prison to the greatest dignity, as it did Joseph; and then his former obscurity is no reproach to him: but one born to inherit a throne, may become poor and distressed by his misconduct. 'Folly 'makes the other impatient of all advice; and the older 'he is, the more obstinate he grows: because as his kingly 'dignity, he fancies, authorizes him to do what he lists; so 'his age gives him a privilege of knowing better than any 'body can tell him.' (Bp. Patrick.) Probably Solomon foreboded, that this might be the case with Rehoboam, as it afterwards in some measure proved.

V. 15, 16. These verses state that Solomon observed the general propensity of men to prefer the heir-apparent, as we say, to the reigning prince, however wise and excellent. This he remarked to be the way of all the living, who walk under the sun: they are fond of changes, and pay court to the king's son, though comparatively a child, in preference to the king; as he is second, or next to him, and is shortly to stand up in his stead. Probably Solomon observed this in the case of Rehoboam, with some uneasiness. But he remembered also that the people were continuing the conduct of all that had been before them; of them for instance, who raised a rebellion against David, in favour of Absalom: and however fond they might be of his successor now, they that should come after would not rejoice in him, but choose another favourite instead of him, still worshipping the rising and neglecting the setting sun: and this rendered royalty, however well supported, "vani-"ty and vexation of spirit." 'So this young prince, who 'is now followed with such vast applause, must not think 'that it will last always; but they that come after will 'take as little delight in him, as the present generation 'doth in his father; and when he grows old, court his son, 'after the same fashion, as they now do him being young.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

Wherever we turn our eyes, or our thoughts, we see melancholy proofs of the wickedness and misery of mankind; who, as if the evils of life and death were insufficient, seem to employ all their ingenuity and industry in creating trouble to themselves and each other! So that every where under the sun, (except as good government allays the evil,) the earth is full of the oppressions of the powerful, and the groans and tears of the oppressed, who often are without redress or comfort: for so selfish are men, that when not directly concerned in oppression, they are more disposed to pay court to the affluent oppressor, than to compassionate or alleviate the miseries of the unhappy sufferers. In this view there is litte reason to desire the continuance of life: and if this were all, we might be ready to congratulate those who had done with its few pleasures and many pains; and even to conclude it best, never to have entered into such a wicked wretched world. And when we take into the account the future state of righteous retribution, we may well say of ungodly men, that it had been better for them, had they never been born. But we should never forget, that all these miseries are the effects of God's displeasure for the iniquities of men, and of their injurious conduct to each other: so that we have no reason to murmur, though we may well despair of happiness in such an afflicted scene. Nay, even they who do works eminently right and good, will reap vanity and vexation from them, in proportion as they expect a reward from men: for, the pride and malignity of the human heart will single them out as the objects of embittered envy; and calumny, ingratitude, and opposition will as certainly pursue eminent characters, as the shadow the substance. Yet none, but the fool, will fold his hands in indolence, and suffer his abilities to rust away for want of exercising them: for, the effects of sloth, inducing poverty and unpitied distress, are more vexatious than any labour and disappointment. But to be diligent in every right work, from a believing regard to God's gracious acceptance and a love to his name; and then modestly to shun ostentation and competition; to be quiet and mind our own business, avoiding contention, and seeking a comfortable provision for ourselves, and to be useful to others, may somewhat alleviate these vexations. In this sense, "better is an "handful with quietness than both hands full with travail "and vexation of spirit." Yet the miser's folly is more egregious, than even that of the sluggard. Men commonly devise some plausible pretext for their avarice: they have families to provide for, or poor relations that have expectations from them; or they labour and hoard now, that they may hereafter enjoy ease and plenty. But the disease gathers strength by time and habit; and is capable of such excess, as could never have been credited, if not proved by facts. Men, who have neither child nor brother, infirm through age, and tottering on the brink of the grave, still scrape and toil without measure or cessation! They continually grow more grasping and penurious; they bereave themselves, as well as others, of all enjoyment and comfort; they are the wretched yet the willing slaves of the most cruel of masters, who gives them no rest or respite; till death remove them, and they leave their idol behind them; and their heirs rejoice, and commonly dissipate their treasure! Surely this is also a vanity, yea, it is a sore travail. Let us then beware of covetousness, and guard against its first beginnings, if we would avoid these despicable and destructive extremes.

V. 9—16.

We cannot escape, but we may mitigate, the vanity of life, by a prudent use of the comforts of society and endeared connexions: this will solace and recompense our labours; we shall have kind friends to sympathize with us in our sorrows, to comfort us when dejected, to animate us in our difficulties, to defend us from injury, or to assist us to repair our losses; and we may render them the same reciprocal services. In all things union gives stability, and tends to success and safety; for "a three-fold cord cannot easily be broken." But above all, the union of Christians, and the communion thence resulting, produce manifold advantages. Whilst with united hearts, endeavours, and prayers, they are occupied in the work of faith and labour of love, they enjoy a good reward. They assist each other, when they fall into any sin, temptation, or trouble, by encouragement or friendly reproof: but "wo to him "that is alone, when he falleth; for he hath not another "to help him up." They warm each other's hearts, whilst they converse together of the joys of heaven, or the love of Christ, or unite in singing his praises; but a solitary Christian will scarcely be very lively, or fervent in spirit. And no enemy can withstand the combined efforts and fervent prayers of associated Christians: nor can Satan prevail against them, except by dividing them. Let brotherly love then continue, and diffuse its divine influence through all the church of Christ: and let us endeavour to improve our opportunities of Christian fellowship, and to turn them to good account. In these things all is not vanity: though there will be imperfection and alloy, as long as we are under the sun. The poorest Christian, however, may find a more solid satisfaction, in communion with God, and the hope of heaven, and in his proper work and the society of his brethren, than any ungodly prince can find upon his throne: nay, the most ignorant and inexperienced believer is wiser and happier, than those, who are old and great, but will not take good counsel. For rank and old age do not always give wisdom, but rather increase pride and obstinacy, which are the most ruinous kinds of folly. And if he, that from a dungeon should, through his wisdom, be advanced to a throne, be preferable to him, who, born in his kingdom, is reduced to poverty by his folly: how honourable and happy will they be, who by faith in the Son of God, are advanced from the bondage of sin and Satan, to the glorious kingdom that cannot be moved! And how miserable and contemptible they, however rich and great, who have their good things here; and then for their sins are condemned to everlasting punishment in hell! Indeed the most politic and successful princes find little comfort in their dignity and reputation. The inconstancy of the people, who soon forget their services; the domestic disquietudes, to which they are far more exposed than their inferiors; and the parties and rivalship, which are thus excited and fomented, commonly fill their closing scene with vexation and bitterness, as every reflecting reader of history must have often remarked. This has been the case in every age: and men must lay their account with it, however at first they may be caressed and extolled: and "surely this also is vanity and vexation of spirit." But the willing subjects of Jesus, our king, from age to age rejoice in him alone, and they will love him more and more to all eternity. May all the living that walk under the sun hear of him, trust in him, and obey him, henceforth to the end of the world. In this alone there is no vanity and vexation.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1—3. Solomon meant by his whole argument, to show, that every thing was vanity except true religion: but here he cautions his readers against those mistakes, which render even religious duties vain and worthless. —'Religion is the only remedy indeed, the only comfort 'we have against all the troubles to which we are subject in 'this world: but such is the vanity of mankind, they spoil 'their very remedy, and take away all the virtue of that 'which should be their support, turning it into a mere 'ceremony, whilst their minds remain impure, and without any true sense of God.' (Bp. Patrick.) Every one indeed ought to attend the house and ordinances of God: but it should be done with holy awe and reverence, shown by the customary external expressions; as Moses was commanded to uncover his feet, when on holy ground. The first care of all, who would acceptably worship God, should be to hear, and learn how he would be worshipped; that they may not, in a precipitate manner, affront him with a hypocritical or superstitious service, or with sacrifices, oblations, or ceremonies, without a correspondent frame of mind. These are "the sacrifices of fools;" who, through ignorance and carelessness, do evil and are not aware of it, but suppose they recommend themselves to God, when in fact they greatly provoke him. Men should therefore avoid rashness in their professions, petitions, or vows; they should not hastily speak before God every thing which occurs to their thoughts. They should remember his greatness and purity who dwelleth in heaven, that high and holy place, and their own indigence and sinfulness: They ought to avoid needless loquacity and vain repetitions; and express themselves in plain language and with perspicuous brevity, such as springs from the heart, and not such as is affected and studied. All kinds of copious prayers cannot be condemned, but only those that are unmeaning; such as the vain repetitions of the heathen who expected to be heard for their much speaking; (1 Kings xviii. 26—29;) the pater-nosters, and other forms used by the Papists, and the long prayers of the Pharisees. These verbose supplications show certain traces of a man's ignorance and folly, and that he has confused, false, and dishonourable thoughts of God and religion; even as the incoherencies of a dream often show the multitude of cares and employments which occupy our waking hours. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—7. Great caution is requisite to avoid sin and vexation in religious vows. In general, a man should pay his vows, if lawful, however inconvenient it may be, and that without delay: for the contrary is extremely foolish and displeasing to God, who is mocked and trifled with; and it is much better to avoid all vows, than thus to infringe them. If a man had vowed any thing rashly, his mouth had given occasion to his flesh, or his corrupt nature, to commit sin; and he would have to plead, either before "the great Angel of the Covenant," (whom some think to be meant;) or before the priest, the messenger of God, or those angels which witness our conduct, that his vow was an imprudence or a mistake. This would provoke the Lord to frown upon him, and prevent the success of his undertakings: and why should a man expose himself to such severe rebukes, by needlessly vowing, or by distrustfully refusing to pay his vows? Men should therefore be watchful over their tongues; for as divers vanities are found in the multitude of dreams; so assuredly will much sin and folly intermingle with the words of him who speaks a great deal, and without due deliberation and reflection. But the proper remedy of these evils consists in the habitual, reverential fear of God, as present with and searching the hearts of all men. 'Cause not thyself to sin 'by vowing rashly; as they do who make a vow to live 'unmarried, and such like.'

V. 8. (Note, iv. 1—3.) It is a great discouragement to those who fear God, to behold the successful villany that is done on earth; especially by the violent perversion of law and justice, which the governors of kingdoms and provinces commit, in defiance of God and man. But they should consider, that though the Lord regardeth, and is higher than the highest of these oppressors; yet he doubtless hath wise reasons for permitting these things, and knows how to educe good from them, and in due season will execute judgment upon the most haughty and prosperous sinners. Nor ought such transactions to excite great amazement, as they are the effects of man's depravity and Satan's power; and it is a part of the Lord's present system, to permit them to take place, for the fuller display of his own glory; though he confines them by certain limitations, which they cannot exceed. The last clause seems to mean the holy angels, the ministers of Providence; who are far higher and mightier than the most powerful tyrants, whom they are often employed to crush and destroy, though even they be as nothing before the King of kings. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—12. The productions of the earth are intended for all men, and to be, in some degree, enjoyed by them: and the king depends as much on them as his poorest subject, and must perish if they were withheld: so that agriculture should above all things be encouraged. Thus our natural wants may be supplied and satisfied: but covetousness is an insatiable lust. If a man have ever so much, he grasps after more; or if he should at length give over his pursuit, he finds himself no more satisfied and happy than he was. His servants and dependents are commonly increased in proportion to his estate: he has no other advantage, except that he can look over all of it, and say, "This is mine!" 'And this very thing, if he be covetous, is his torment, 'that he sees so many mouths which eat at his cost.' (Bp. Patrick.) But the poor labourer sleeps more soundly, whether he have a plentiful or a scanty meal, than the rich man can do; whose cares, fears, suspicions, intemperance, or want of exercise, often spoil his rest, and render his nights as uneasy as his days are insipid.

V. 13—17. It might also be observed in every part of the world, that men bestow great pains to hoard up riches to their own hurt. Their wealth often invites robbers, who alarm or perhaps murder them; or it exposes them to malicious prosecutions. Thus many have been excepted from acts of indemnity, merely because the prevailing party desired to seize their immense possessions. And in various ways riches are often torn from a man with as much anguish, as they were gotten with labour and care; or his children waste them by their extravagance; and he has the vexation to see, that they will be poor notwithstanding all his labour to make them rich. But whether this be the case or not, when a man dies, he can take nothing away with him, and he leaves the world as naked as he came into it; so that he spends his life in labouring for that which he can no more appropriate than the wind; he wears away his days in labour, anxiety, and uneasiness, without any comfort even in his natural enjoyments; he ends his days in sorrow and fretfulness; and the sickness of his body is attended by the sense of God's wrath in his soul, and the dread of a future reckoning; and what a sore evil is a life thus spent and ended, and such an entrance into the eternal state!

V. 18—20. (Note, ii. 24—26.) 'Whosoever he be 'that God hath blessed, not only with plenty of worldly 'goods, but with such a noble and generous mind, that he 'is not the slave, but truly the master of them; being able to 'enjoy them innocently, with cheerfulness and delight 'in doing good to others: Let him be very thankful to 'almighty God for so great a happiness. He that is thus 'favoured, will not think life irksome: but (forgetting all 'past toils, and taking no care of the future,) spend his 'time most pleasantly; because God hath given him his 'very heart's desire in tranquillity of mind, or rather joy 'and gladness.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

It is no wonder that our outward possessions and enjoyments should be so vain and vexatious; when our depraved hearts so generally render even our religious worship useless to ourselves, and dishonourable to God. And if this only source of solid comfort be perverted to vanity, how great must be that vanity! yet, alas! not only mere hypocrites or ostentatious Pharisees provoke God by their vain show of piety: but we have all cause to be humbled and ashamed on this account. How do our wandering imaginations, our want of reverence, faith, love, gratitude, and spirituality, and the incursions of pride and vanity, render our attendance on divine ordinances little better than a mere lip-labour, or the sacrifice of fools! This should teach us to prepare for the service of God, and to go with cheerful, yet with solemn steps, into his more immediate presence; to be of a teachable spirit, and studious so to learn his will, that we may not inconsiderately do evil in his sacred worship; to recollect who and where we sinful creatures are, and who that God is, unto whom we speak: that the filial boldness, with which we come to his throne of grace, may not degenerate into an irreverent familiarity. We should also remember, that we do not confess our sins, or our obligations, or make known our requests before the Lord, for his information; but in order to bring our minds in a humble dependent frame, and to render him that honour which belongs unto him. We should therefore watch against rashness and presumption: we should think, before we speak to the Lord, that our words may correspond to our desires, and accord with his promises: we should be very watchful against ostentation in public services, as if, by copiousness and eloquence of words we meant to attract the attention or admiration of men, or thought we should prevail with God. No unmeaning repetitions, that were ever used in formal worship, can be more offensive to God, than such pompous declamations, even in the use of extempore prayer: the confusion of a dream is not more

CHAP. VI.

The vanity of riches, without power to enjoy them; and of large families and long life, 1—6. The little advantage that a wise man has above a fool, or one man above another, 7, 8. The vanity impertinent, the vain babbling of a fool is not more disgusting to judicious and pious minds, than such an affected multiplicity of words in religious worship. A few broken sentences from a humble heart, spoken in reverence, and with pious affections, whilst the speaker is ashamed of his own poor performance, are more honourable and acceptable to God, than those affected services which are often greatly admired by men, but in reality are a compound of arrogance, ignorance, and hypocrisy. Our words should then be few, except as the heart is fraught with large and manifold desires, which struggle for utterance, and which no words can fully express. We have also great cause to guard against rashness in religious vows: and, in those things which are not previously our bounden duty, we should never vow without consideration, counsel, and prayer: we should be satisfied that the thing engaged for be lawful, in our own power, no injury to others, and fit for us to perform, however circumstances may vary; otherwise we shall be tempted to delays and evasions, which will manifest our own folly, and provoke the Lord to anger; we shall fall into temptations and snares; and when we should be performing our vows, we shall be seeking excuses, before God or man, or in our own consciences, why we should violate them. But however this may escape human observation, the Lord will not be trifled with; and manifold disappointments and losses in every undertaking may at length make us sensible, that it would have been better for us to have paid what we had vowed. Let us then remember, that we must give an account of every unprofitable word at the day of judgment; and, that when we give an unbounded license to our tongues, we might as well expect a multitude of dreams without any incoherency, as that our discourse should be without wickedness and mischief: and especially let us seek to have our hearts possessed with the fear of God, and delivered from the fear of man or desire of his applause.

V. 8—20.

In this present world we must expect to behold, and perhaps to suffer, the oppression of the wicked, and their violence and perversion of law and equity. But the Lord will carry his people through their troubles, and execute vengeance on their adversaries. "For He that is higher "than the highest, regardeth, and there be higher than "they." Let us then pity and help the oppressed, as we have power; but neither envy nor fear successful oppressors: nay, we should pity and pray for them also, as long as there are any hopes of their escaping the damnation of hell. The rich and great indeed are apt to think themselves entitled to every thing, and independent of every one: yet they are not only equally dependent on the Lord for daily bread, with the poorest beggar; but they are more dependent on the labour of the ploughman, than he is on their wealth. The goodness of providence is more equally distributed, than appears to a superficial observer. The most plentiful productions of the earth are in reality most valuable: the king needs them, and the poor share them; and these relish their mean morsel, better than he does his luxuries. Thus far the profit of the field is satisfying, as the proper provision for our bodies: but no riches or abundance can supply the wants, or satisfy the desires of our souls; the attempt must be for ever vain and vexatious; nay, the increase of riches increases cumber and care more than enjoyment; except a man's mind can be filled by his eyes pouring upon securities, surveying his acres, or viewing his hoarded gold. And it is evident in fact, that the poor labourer sleeps sweetly without fear or disturbance, whilst the abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep. For the more men covet wealth, the greater anxiety must they feel, when they consider its uncertainty. The riches, that have been gathered and hoarded by the toil and penury of many years, are often swept away by some unforeseen calamity: or a covetous man, by grasping at some still larger advantage, loses all in some ruinous project; nay, whilst his riches perish by such evil travail, he often loses his life attempting to preserve them, or breaks his heart for very vexation at his disappointment; or his children spend all, and become as poor, as if he had neither laboured nor saved. And whether the rich man do, or do not, survive his wealth, a coffin, a shroud, and a grave, all given him at the option of his survivors, will shortly be his whole inventory; and in other respects, as he came, so shall he go, except that he must give an account for all his conduct at the tribunal of God. What a sore evil then is this, for a rational creature to spend his life in incessant toil, care, and uneasiness; and to live in dejection and fretfulness all his life; and then to end his days in sorrow and wrath, as well as with sickness and dying pains! Having therefore food and raiment, let us be therewith content: and let us cheerfully use what God giveth us, as the fruit of our labour, for the ends for which he bestows it. If he pleases that we should be poor, let us be patient and satisfied; we may be safer and happier in that situation than if we were richer: and if God gives a man riches, let him remember to receive them from his hand, and to use them to his glory, and to rejoice in doing the duties of his station. It is a singular mercy, when God giveth a man wealth, and enableth him to use it in a becoming and useful manner, taking his portion with moderation and thankfulness; avoiding avarice and extravagance, and doing good according to his ability. This wisdom cometh from above; they who desire it must ask it of God, and they who have it will praise him for it. And if God answer a man's prayers and expectations in those better things, which are, and ought to be, the joy of his heart: whether he have much or little, he will not make great account of the shortness and vanity, or the pleasures or pains of this life; or perplex himself about the past, or the future: seeing his heart and treasure are out of the reach of the changes of this lower world, in a kingdom which can never be moved.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The former part of this chapter is a continuation of the subject, with which the preceding chapter concludes; namely, the vanity of riches, without a heart or power to make a proper use of them; which was then, and is still, a very common evil under the sun. (Notes, v. 13—20.)

V. 2. 'He showeth that it is the plague of God, 'when a rich man hath not a liberal heart to use his riches.' —The expressions by which the rich man's prosperity is described, are very emphatical. 'To those two words, 'riches and wealth, he here adds a third, viz. glory; which 'is more comprehensive than the other, including all those 'good things, which may do a man credit, and raise him to 'a splendid condition.' 'It denotes any thing that hath 'weight in it, and makes a man to be valued.' (Gen. xxxi. 1.) 'Yet so great is his ingratitude to God, and his un-'charitableness to men; that for these and other sins, God 'denies him the power to enjoy these gifts of his bounty.' (Bp. Patrick.) The passage indeed may be explained of sickness and bodily infirmities, by means of which a man is deprived of all comfort from his wealth and dignity; and his attendants and physicians reap more advantage from his estate than he does. Yet it rather seems to refer to the miser's penuriousness, and to the suspicions and distastes which he imbibes respecting his children and relations; through which he attaches himself to strangers, who devour his substance, either during his life or after his death, to the injury of his children and family. This is a diseased state of the mind, and renders a man very miserable.

V. 3—5. The most flourishing family, and the longest life with increasing prosperity, cannot make that man happy, "whose soul is not filled with good:" "If he can 'never have enough, as we see often that the covetous man 'falleth into crimes that deserve death, or is murdered, or 'drowned, or hangeth himself, or such like, and so lack-'eth the honour of burial.' Nay, if a man have no heart to use his abundance, and thus lives uncomfortably; and if he be treated with disrespect at his death, and not buried decently according to his rank, either through the avarice of his heirs, or their contempt of his character; he may justly be deemed more unhappy and dishonoured than even an untimely birth, which seems indeed to come into the world in vain, and leaves it in obscurity and disgrace, and has no name to be remembered on earth; which hath not seen the sun, or enjoyed any pleasure, or known any thing: yet hath this embryo more rest than the other. It had rest in the womb, and now rests in the grave; its pain was transient, its unhappiness a mere negation of pleasure, and it lived not to contract guilt. Whereas the other had little pleasure in life, and endured much vexation, contracted much guilt, and departed with disgrace to give an account of it at God's tribunal.

V. 6. Should the joyless, vexatious life of such a man be lengthened out to above twice the age of Methuselah, it would only prolong his miseries: and he must go down at last to the dust, like the child that died in the womb. The grave is exclusively meant, for in the eternal world there are distinct places for the righteous and the wicked; as Solomon evidently believed, or he would not have said, that "the righteous hath hope in his death."

V. 7, 8. Though the labour of man as to this present world is chiefly bestowed about the supply of his bodily wants, and the satisfaction of his animal desires; yet the very appetite for food cannot be durably satisfied, but still craves more and more with each returning day; whilst the relish of it continually grows more languid. In this respect the most learned, ingenious, or sagacious man, has no advantage above the very idiot; who by one means or other gets food, and relishes it as well as the other. Nay, the poor man, who knows how to suit himself to his station, and to act prudently whilst he continues among the living, has as much comfort as the richest; and in what then is he under any real disadvantage? "What hath the poor that "knoweth to walk before the living?" 'Even the same as 'the rich: namely, a supply of food, &c. to satisfy his 'natural wants and appetites, which is all that the rich can 'have, notwithstanding their abundance.'

CHAP. VII.

The benefit of a good name; of death above life; and of sorrow and rebuke

V. 9. The sight of the eyes seems to mean present enjoyment; for it is a pleasant thing for the eyes to behold the light. This is preferable to the restless desires, imaginations, and schemes, that engross men's minds, spoil their present comfort, and create them abundance of vexation. 'To be content with that which God hath given, is better 'than to follow the desires which never can be satisfied.' 'It is far better for a man to enjoy the present good, which is 'before his eyes, than to excruciate and rack his thoughts 'with an insatiable desire of what he hath not, and per-'haps cannot have.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 10. The whole of what man can obtain of wisdom, power, renown, wealth, or prosperity, has already been declared; but the word man or Adam, implies his condition in his best estate; as taken from and returning to the dust of the earth, and condemned to spend his days and eat his bread in sorrow, and in the sweat of his brow, till that sentence be executed. And it is in vain to contend with that almighty Judge, who hath passed this sentence upon him, or to endeavour to get it reversed. 'Although 'a man grow famous, yet it is known that he is but a man: 'and he cannot contend with him that is stronger than 'himself.' (Melancthon.)

V. 11, 12. Seeing the many things, which men pursue on earth, only form an increase of vanities: what is man the better for all his worldly devices and acquisitions? Who indeed can so much as tell what is good for man, all the days of his vain life, which passeth as a shadow? Or who can inform him of what will hereafter befal him, or of what will take place after his death, or become of his family? 'Those four things, in which men place their 'happiness, wisdom, pleasure, honour and wealth, draw 'so many, and so great inconveniences after them, as suffi-'ciently demonstrate, a man is still to seek for the satisfac-'tion of his desires, if he look no further.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

There are not only many and sore evils and miseries under the sun, but they are common among men; as every careful observer of mankind must know. For it is seen often, that Providence confers on a man a confluence of earthly possessions; so that he wanteth nothing for outward enjoyment, and hath no desire after more substantial good: and yet the Lord leaves him so to his avarice, or his malignant dispositions, that he has no heart to make a comfortable use of them; and by one means or other, they all come into the hands of strangers; and this is vanity and a sore disease. Nay, put the case, that any one have a numerous family, and a good constitution, and live in health and affluence to old age; yet if his soul be not enriched with wisdom and grace, and so he lives unbeloved, and dies unlamented and despised; it were wiser to envy the felicity of a still-born child, than that of such a person, who hath only staid on earth to contract guilt and experience vexation. Sooner or later, the rich and the poor, the wise and the foolish, must be laid in the grave: and it is of small consequence whether this be in infancy, or after double the years of the oldest man who ever lived; seeing the cares so much overbalance the pleasures of life: except as we live to prepare for heaven, to glorify God, and to do good. For setting these things aside, how vain are all man's labours, how empty are all his enjoyments! A round of trifling pursuits and unsatisfying gratifications, the pleasure of which is more than counterbalanced by the uneasy cravings of the appetite which are continually returning! And what in this view can the wise do towards acquiring happiness above the fool? or the rich above the poor and industrious? Nay, the poorest man, who knows how to walk before the living God, is far happier here than the most prosperous ungodly man. Yet the pleasure of present enjoyments is far better than the empty reveries of visionary good on which many feed as upon the wind; and start out of these waking dreams and find themselves empty, or rather filled with vexation at their disappointment, and tortured with the gnawing of their exorbitant and roving desires. But indeed every endeavour of sinful mortal man to find rest and happiness in earthly things, is a vain struggle against the sentence passed upon him for his rebellion, or rather against the effects of his apostacy. And it is equally vain, and still more impious, to cavil at the justice of the sentence, and to contend with Him that is mightier than he. If the earth, with all its inventions and possessions, be only an accumulated vanity; what is man the better for all his speculations and devices? For where is he that can show unto man any substantial good, in created things, with which he may solace his mind, whilst he passes as a shadow through this vain life? Every attempt of this kind would be as futile, as the pretences of fortune-tellers, to inform us of those future events which God hath kept secret from all living, and should be treated as a presumption of the same nature. But in returning unto God, trusting in his mercy through Jesus Christ, submitting to his will, and preparing for death by a conscientious obedience to his commands, we may find rest to our souls, and enjoy sweet earnests of heavenly consolations; and soon shall we glide through this vexatious world, and find ourselves in that happy place, where "is fulness of joy, and pleasures at God's "right hand for evermore."

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. Solomon 'now seems to proceed to prescribe the best remedies that can be found, 'against that vanity to which we are subject; by setting 'down many wise precepts for our direction, support, 'and comfort, in a troublesome world. And if we exa- 'mine the following particulars, we shall find them com- 'prehended in this general direction; the change of our 'minds, thoughts, and opinions. The doctrines that begin 'this chapter, are quite opposite to the common opinions 'of the world. That a good name is to be preferred to 'precious ointment; and the day of one's death before 'one's birth-day; mourning before feasting, sadness before 'laughter; rebukes before commendations; the end of a 'thing before the beginning of it; a patient suffering spi- 'rit, before a stout haughty mind; wisdom before riches, '&c. These, and such like, are the maxims of true 'wisdom and piety, which must be learnt; in order to 'the settlement of our minds in peace and tranquillity, 'notwithstanding the vanity that is in all things.' (Bp. Patrick.) The beatitudes with which our Lord began his sermon on the mount, are a collection of paradoxes, not wholly dissimilar from those of Solomon, but more complete and comprehensive; on the due understanding and reception of which, the Christian's wisdom, comfort, and usefulness peculiarly depend. (Note, Matt. v. 1—12.) —A reputation for piety and integrity will do far more to render a man agreeable, useful, and comfortable, than the most costly perfumes. (Marg. Ref.) And to a wise and godly man, the day when he leaves this vain world, is happier than that on which he came into it: for the one was the beginning of his sorrows; and the other terminates them, and begins his endless felicity. (Note, Prov. xxii. 1.)

V. 2—6. The day of death is sometimes more useful to a man's survivors, than any day of his life was; as it is more profitable to go to those houses where there is mourning for the dead, than to those where feasting and mirth prevail: for as death is the end of all men, every one is concerned to consider and prepare for it, and such scenes are calculated to give a serious turn to the mind. So that sorrow may be preferred to laughter: and the drooping countenance which occasions thoughtfulness, though occasioned by sharp trials, and attended by painful conflicts, is a proper medicine for the diseases of the human heart, and is often productive of a happy change. It is therefore a mark of wisdom for a man to go willingly to the house of mourning, at the call of duty, and often to reflect on death and another world; and it is a proof of folly, when nothing is delighted in but mirth and levity. Even rebukes, when wisely given, are far better for the soul than the diversions of ungodly men: for their laughter is a mere transient noise and bustle, which soon expire like the crackling of thorns in the fire, and produces no abiding pleasure or good; but is indeed a mere vanity.

V. 7. 'A man that is esteemed wise, when he falleth 'to oppression, becometh like a beast.' Thus the tendency of oppressive measures to infatuate and bewilder those that use, not those who endure, them, may be meant: and the latter clause may be considered as showing what leads a man, in other respects wise, to oppress his neighbours: namely, a gift or bribe which powerfully corrupts the heart. Yet the former clause is generally understood of the effect produced on the oppressed. It is the more necessary to settle the judgment on right principles; because various events, which must be expected, tend to disturb the mind, and raise tempests in the soul. Thus violent oppression may drive even a man, wise in other respects, to act in the most outrageous manner, as if bereft of understanding. Many have been thus excited to insurrections, and have in consequence been butchered, or executed as rebels: and no human wisdom is sufficient, at all times, to preserve a man in such trying circumstances: nay, even pious men have, for a time, been thus betrayed into very unwarrantable measures: while, on the other hand, the offer of a large gift or bribe, unless the heart be established by grace on sound principles, may produce the most fatal effects on those who before seemed well disposed. V. 8. 'He noteth their lightness which enterprise a 'thing, and suddenly leave it off again.'——'The con-'clusion of all things is to be expected, before we judge 'of them: for whilst they are growing and coming on, 'they appear with quite a different face, from what they 'have when they are gone.' (Bp. Patrick.) This may be understood, either of good undertakings, which at first appear unpromising; but in the event, succeed beyond expectation: or of trials, which are grievous for the time, but end well. (Marg. Ref.) "And better is the low in "spirit, than the high in spirit." 'A meek and patient-'spirited man, that can quietly wait for the end and event 'of things, is better than he, that is proud and impetuous, 'who violently rushes on all enterprises, and will needs 'force his own terms.' (Bp. Hall.) The hastiness of giving up good designs, because of difficulties, as opposed to a steady courageous perseverance, seems also especially intended.

V. 9. 'Anger is an enemy to counsel and advice, and 'is indeed the property of fools; who out of weakness of 'mind are familiarly transported with it upon the slight-'est causes: and not easily appeased again, as wise men 'are when they happen to be incensed.' (Bp. Patrick.) The same word is sometimes rendered anger, at others grief: and the excess of grief, as fixing its residence in the heart, and unfitting a man for every great and good undertaking, should be guarded against, as well as anger: and with the more care, as it is more plausible and creditable than anger and revenge. A few say, 'I do well to indulge 'anger:' but many say, 'I do well to indulge grief:' and indeed those are often censured, who will not suffer it to settle in their bosoms.

V. 10. We know the evil of former times only by report, but we feel present inconveniences; and therefore are prone to think former times better to live in than the present. But though corrupt nature has shown its malignity in various ways, and has been counteracted by the interposition of God in different degrees, and calamitie have been dispensed in greater or less proportion; yet the earth hath always been replete with iniquity and misery: and it is no proof of wisdom to inquire after the reason of that which probably exists only in men's distempered imaginations. The dotage of some speculators concerning a golden age, and the happiness of men in the simple state of nature, are specimens of this unwise method of speaking concerning former times.

V. 11, 12. "Wisdom is good with an inheritance," as it enables a man to do the more good with it, during his continuance on earth: or "wisdom is as good as an inhe-"ritance, and more profitable to them that see the sun." Money may indeed purchase exemption from many trials and dangers: but true wisdom and knowledge alone can deliver a man from destruction, and make him acquainted with the way of life and salvation. (Phil. iii. 8—10.)

V. 13, 14. (Note, i. 15.) Man's wisdom consists in observing, and suiting himself to, God's unalterable appointments. In prosperity he should be joyful, and thankful, and do good: in adversity he should consider, that the righteous Lord is the Author of afflictions, whoever be the instrument; and that sin is the cause of sufferings: he should examine what sins he has committed, that have brought the correction upon him; and how he may obtain support under them, benefit by them, and deliverance from them. He should consider the vanity of the world, and seek a better portion; the evil of sin, and exercise repentance; and the approach of death, and prepare for it. For indeed God hath thus intermingled prosperity and adversity in the lot of man on earth, that he might still feel his dependence on Him, and seek all his happiness from him; without either being lifted up in prosperity, or sinking into despair.

V. 15. By the "days of his vanity," Solomon may either mean his life in this vain world, or that part of it when he was seeking happiness in vanity. He had sometimes observed a very upright conscientious man ruined, as to his temporal interests, and even bereft of his life by means of his righteousness; meaning that cruel tyrants put the godly to death, and let the wicked go free: and so a wicked man prolongeth his life in his wickedness. Hence he seems to infer that this vain world could not be all, but that a future state of retributions might be expected.

|| Heb. he that is good before God ii. 26

V. 16, 17. Some think that the former of these verses contains the words of an ungodly man; who hearing that sometimes a righteous man is ruined by his righteousness, gravely exhorts men not to be too diligent, exact, and scrupulous, either about the practice or the study of religion; as it would probably be prejudicial to their interests, and eventually ruin them. And the latter verse they suppose to be Solomon's answer to the objector, in which he warns him not to be so daring in his wickedness, lest God should be provoked to cut him off prematurely, and in his sins. But there are many parts or appearances of religion, which may be carried to a pernicious extreme. A man may be over tenacious of insignificant forms, or human inventions: he may pretend to kinds and degrees of righteousness, which the Scriptures do not require, laying much stress on celibacy, fastings, and austerities of various kinds; his boldness and zeal may verge towards rashness and rage; his conscientiousness may degenerate into superstition and scrupulousness; his benevolence into indiscretion; and his candour and good nature into folly: and in affecting to be acquainted with the whole of divine truth, he may become presumptuously curious, and intrude into unrevealed things. Thus many run into extremes, and expose themselves to needless persecution, or to the anger of God. 'Be not 'too rigorous in exacting the extremity of justice upon 'every occasion: neither do thou affect too much semblance and ostentation of more justice than thou hast. 'Neither do thou arrogate more wisdom to thyself than is 'in thee.' (Bp. Hall.) Some expound the verses of the public administration of justice, which should neither be too severe nor too lenient: but though these extremes may be included among others, yet there is no reason to think they were specially intended. That the affectation or ostentation of extraordinary righteousness or an over-doing in some outward observances, while more essential matters were proportionably neglected, was intended; and not simple, humble, purity and zeal, seems evident from the caution to the reader not to make himself over-wise; that is, "Be not wise in thine own conceit;" or, do not intrude into secret things which belong to God. Here affectation, or excess, in some particulars, must be meant; and so doubtless in the other clause. It is, however, certain that we cannot love and serve God too much, or be over-righteous in any thing for which we can produce the warrant of his word: and the other extreme, of presumptuous and over-much wickedness, is vastly more common and ruinous.

V. 18. It is profitable to lay hold, and keep hold, of both these counsels, and to avoid all extremes; and he who fears God, will be preserved from these dangers and snares, or extricated out of them.

V. 19, 20. The prudent precautions and contrivances of one wise man may do more towards the preservation of a city, than the power of ten mighty men. Or rather, true wisdom gives a strength and fortitude to the soul, which far surpasses all natural courage, by leading a man to trust in God for protection. And this confidence is warranted, even though there be no righteous man on earth, whose good actions are perfectly free from sin; seeing God deals with all believers according to his covenant of mercy and grace in Jesus Christ.

V. 21, 22. 'The consideration of which frailty is 'useful many ways, to teach us gentleness towards those 'who do us injuries.' (Tit. iii. 1—3.) (Bp. Patrick.) These verses are also a most important counsel, how to avoid the vexation of this vain world. When men are in a passion, or actuated by envy, they will speak very provoking things; and they, who notice them, will be continually embroiled, nay, their very servants will be a perpetual vexation to them. On one occasion or other they may speak disrespectfully, utter slanders, or wish evil to some one, and this may be over-heard and reported, and create much confusion, when perhaps it was only a hasty word, without much meaning. For if a man watches his heart, when he is vexed and fretful, he will find in numerous instances a propensity to speak such words, or vent such wishes, respecting others, not excepting even his friends and superiors.

29 Lo, this only have I found, that [g] God hath made man upright; but [h] they have sought out many inventions.

V. 23—28. These practical matters Solomon had proved by wisdom; but he humbly owned, that he had greatly failed of his determined purpose of being wise. Many things he found himself incapable of investigating or comprehending: and in his earnest search into the nature and reason of things, and to discover the wickedness of men's ignorance, carelessness, and impiety, and of their vain mirth and mad intemperance, he had found himself betrayed into much folly; especially he had been miserably deluded by unprincipled women, to the unspeakable anguish of his heart. All imaginable stratagems and artifices were employed by them to ensnare men in wickedness, and all efforts to hold them in bondage. (Notes, &c. 1 Kings xi.) Solomon here speaks very contritely of his own miscon duct; and doubtless was delivered out of this snare of Satan. Yet he, and he alone, who habitually aimed to please God, could expect to escape this danger, into which the careless sinner would fall probably to rise no more. Again Solomon observed, with surprise, that, when he looked over his courtiers and his subjects, one by one, as far as their conduct fell under his inspection, in order to make out the number of truly pious and honest persons among them, he could find a few men of this stamp, at least one of a thousand: but a woman among all those, (that is, among his thousand wives and concubines,) had he not found; not one who was thoroughly chaste, upright, and pious. We are not hence to infer, that Solomon thought there were fewer good women than men: but that he knew that he had not gone the right way to find the virtuous woman, when he deviated so widely from the original law of marriage; and instead of seeking one rational companion, the sole object of his endeared affections, he had collected a vast multitude for magnificence and indul gence. The more valuable part of the sex would not willingly form one in such a group: and if any of them were previously well disposed, the jealousies, party-interests, contests, and artifices, which take place in such situations, would tend exceedingly to corrupt them, and render them all nearly of the same character. Solomon therefore here speaks the language of a penitent, warning others against the sins into which he had been betrayed; and not that of a waspish satirist, lashing indiscriminately one half of the human species.

V. 29. The royal preacher sums up the whole of his observations on the state and conduct of man, in this verdict. God indeed created man upright, and very good; but Adam having apostatized from him, his posterity have sought out an immense number of inventions, in order to find happiness in the world, and without God, which have only proved so many variations of impiety and iniquity: so that very few pious persons are to be found any where on earth. 'A most decisive testimony concerning original sin, and the wretched state of man by nature!'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

That is most valuable which is most useful, and enables a man to do the greatest good: a character therefore for probity and discretion is far more desirable, than worldly possessions or pleasures; nay, than the renown of shining talents and splendid performances. But a name in "the "book of life" is the only distinction which will prove finally advantageous. If this be our felicity, and our experience and conduct evidence it; we may rejoice in the thoughts of death, as a removal from sorrow and fear, and an entrance upon the full enjoyment of all which we have here loved and thirsted after. Others may be weary of the sufferings of life, and be driven out of the world with a vain hope of terminating their anguish: but the established believer alone is willing to live, though in pain: and willing to die, that he may go to be with Him "whom his soul "loveth." He finds it profitable to frequent the house of mourning, as it keeps him serious and recollected in the thoughts of his latter end: and he perceives and experiences, that the house of feasting tends to render the mind dissipated, and the conscience either unfeeling or uneasy. Nay, he learns to take more solid pleasure, in sympathizing with and comforting the afflicted, than in scenes of festivity and vain mirth. To be frequently the spectators of affliction, tends also to abate our pride and love of worldly things, and to endear the eternal salvation of the Gospel. Indeed sorrow is more suited than carnal joy to our state in this sinful suffering world: the Redeemer wept; but it is not recorded that he ever laughed, though he rejoiced in spirit. A serious mind is the proper soil for wisdom; consideration is the beginning of repentance and conversion; and that sadness of countenance, which induces consideration, is a suitable medicine to cure the diseases of the heart. By despising these maxims, men detect their own character: for "the heart of the wise is in the house of "mourning; but the heart of fools is in the house of "mirth:" He who runs from those scenes in which men may both do and get good, and hurries to places where every thing tends to dissipate reflection, and to keep him from thinking of death till it comes, is likely to live and die without wisdom or hope. And though such rebukes as this of the wise man sound harsh, and give pain, they are far better than the songs, and music, and empty laughter, with which so many waste their lives, as if they were sent into the world to play the fool, to die, and perish. For the whole is "like the crackling of thorns under a "pot," a mere shadow of joy, which soon expires, and leaves the soul to darkness and despair. This also is very vanity, and yet the world is full of it! To support the expenses of dissipated and licentious pleasures, wicked men oppress those who are far wiser and better than

CHAP. VIII.

A commendation of wisdom, 1. The king must be obeyed, from prudence, and for conscience-sake, 2—5. The misery of men for want of foresight, neglect of opportunities, and the unavoidable stroke of death, 6—8. Men abuse power, and the patience of God, to the increase of wickedness and misery, 9—11. The righteous happy, and the wicked miserable; notwithstanding contrary appearances, 12—15. The unsearchableness of God's counsels and works, 16, 17.

themselves; and not only injure them in temporal things, but tempt them to many sins for which they will in some measure be answerable. For many have by persecution been driven to renounce the service of God; and even wise and pious men have for a time been driven into mad and foolish measures, by the vehemence of temptation to which oppressors exposed them! Considering the sharp trials which may await us, and conscious of our own frailty, we should earnestly pray that the grace of our Lord may be sufficient for us. We should avoid all occasions of sin; such as covetousness, which, among numerous other evils, leads to bribery; and a bribe corrupts the heart, and overpowers the good purposes of those who intended to do justice. Contention also runs a man into innumerable snares, and is far more easily begun, than ended; yet the end of it is indeed better than the beginning. But we shall have continual need of patience; that we may wait, in the way of faith and obedience, the event of those trials which now distress us, but may hereafter comfort us, and of every good undertaking, which will surely at first have difficulties to encounter; and that we may with quietness bear the injuries of our fellow-creatures, which is far happier than to be proud in spirit and swift to wrath. For if we be hasty in spirit to be angry, we may next be tempted to harbour revenge; and experience will then surely convince us, that he is very foolish who suffers anger to rest in his heart. We should likewise watch against discontent: the wickedness of the world around us should excite our sorrow, and our endeavours for personal and public reformation; but we must be careful not to reflect on Providence, or to undervalue our mercies, as if our lot were cast in the most unhappy times. For such complaints originate from ignorance, inconsideration, pride, and impatience. All times and places hitherto have abounded in sin and in trouble: we should therefore seek our rest in God, and he will enable us to live comfortably in any times.

V. 11—22.

Without true wisdom, the largest estate will little profit the owner, even for the short space that he will see the sun in the land of the living: but with it his riches may be useful to himself and others: and if the wise man have no estate on earth, he has that which is unspeakably better: he has the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ, which will secure him from all evil, and bring him to endless felicity. We ought also to consider the work of God, even in those things which come on us through men's wickedness; that we may submit to his wise and righteous appointments, which cannot be altered, and could not be mended. We should expect and prepare for changes; the day of prosperity, whilst it enables us to rejoice, calls upon us to exercise gratitude and do good: the day of adversity calls us to consideration, repentance, and prayer: and the interchanges of joy and sorrow continually instruct us, that God himself is the only unchangeable Good of his people, and that all else is vanity and uncertainty. Even piety will not exempt us from calamities here: we should therefore count our cost; for in our days of vanity here below, the righteous often suffers for his righteousness, and the wicked prospers by his wickedness: if, however, we suffer according to the will of God, we are and shall be happy; but we should be careful not to provoke opposition, by unscriptural rigidness, by fiery zeal, by severe censures, or dogmatical decisions concerning those who differ from us; and we may leave it to the followers of Antichrist to be zealous for uncommanded austerities and observances. They who are thus righteous over-much, and provoke opposition, do not suffer for righteousness' sake, "but "destroy themselves." Let us then be zealous and diligent in the substantial parts of true religion, on which the Scriptures principally insist; and then we shall be in no danger of exceeding: and when we hear men, with profane solemnity, cautioning others against being too bold and active in the service of God; let us caution them not to bring themselves into swift destruction, by their presumptuous crimes. Alas, how many die before their time, by the hand of the executioner, and by loathsome diseases, through their own over-much wickedness! The path of truth and duty, however, commonly lies in the middle, at a distance from extremes; and it is good to take hold of both these cautions: but if we truly fear God, he will conduct us safely on this perilous way, and bring us forth from every snare and the power of every enemy. The wisdom that He giveth is the strength and support of the soul, as it leads the possessors to make "his name their strong "Tower:" and though we are such poor polluted sinners, and "there is not a just man on earth, that doeth good, and "sinneth not;" yet our God will mercifully accept and preserve those who trust in him and desire to do his will. If then he so bear with us, we ought to bear with each other: but they that take fire at every affront, will be always quarrelling and sinning: and the modern point of honour, tenaciously observed, would be the rule of being always mischievous and always miserable. He that hath most self-knowledge and is most watchful over his own heart, in different circumstances, will make most allowance for others; being conscious that he needs it from them. In proportion as men are careful to approve themselves to God, they will be less anxious to obtain man's approbation: and they who are very desirous of knowing what others say of them, perhaps expecting to hear their own commendations, will generally be disappointed, and hear such things from every quarter as are vexatious and mortifying; for few think so favourably of others, as they do of themselves.

V. 23—29.

Various important lessons may be learned in wisdom's school, and will be confirmed by experience: but when we resolve, and even bestow pains, to be wise, we shall often find it far from us. Many things are too deep for us to fathom, and too distant for us to explore. And whilst we apply our hearts to search out wisdom, and the reason of things: our principal study, as sinners, relates to the nature, evil, foolishness, and madness of sin, with its causes, effects, and remedies. But, alas! they who should teach wisdom to others, are often themselves led to act very foolishly, and by nothing more than by bad women. Happy is he whom God preserves from this most fatal snare, and all its bitter effects. Would we be so happy, let us seek to walk before God and in his sight, trusting in his grace, and observing all his precepts: for many are left to fall into dreadful evils, to punish them for their pride, hypocrisy, or wickedness in other respects. If any such captives of Satan have been delivered by a miracle of mercy, they have more abundant cause for gratitude and watchfulness; and they should be doubly earnest to warn others of their danger. Many a godly man can with thankfulness acknowledge, that he hath found one prudent and virtuous woman in the wife of his bosom, and aver that he desires no more: but they who have gone as far as they could in Solomon's track, have seldom found one such in all the multitude. This militates against polygamy, as well as every other species of licentiousness: and it is a general rule, that they who declaim most severely against women, have their chief acquaintance with the most worthless of the sex. In short, the law of God is the rule of our happiness; and the world is miserable, principally because this rule is so universally disregarded and violated. It is most lamentable that so few, either men or women, can be found, who are really the upright servants of God; and that man, whom God made upright, hath found out so many inventions to render himself wicked and miserable. But let us bless God for Jesus Christ, and seek for his special grace, that we may be numbered with his chosen remnant in glory everlasting.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1. Solomon had shown that wisdom is hard to be acquired; that the wisest are in many things mistaken; and that even wisdom is often attended with vexation: yet he here inquires, who is worthy to be compared with the wise man; the man who knows how to interpret the word of God, and to explain the nature and uses of surrounding objects; and to avail himself of his acquaintance with men and things, that he may be able properly to direct his conduct as circumstances may require? He observes that wisdom confers a peculiar dignity and comeliness on the possessor, and gives him an ascendency over the minds of men: yea, the boldness of his countenance is doubled, by the consciousness that he understands the subject, or the work, in which he is engaged. Some interpret the last clause to mean, that by wisdom, the severity and over-bearing confidence of a man's looks are changed into mildness and modesty. 'The more we know, 'the more humble we ought to be; and by the cheerful-'ness and pleasantness of our countenance to invite others 'to us; and not by our frowning forbid them, or make 'them afraid to approach us.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Where-'as before he was proud and arrogant, he shall become, '(by wisdom,) humble and meek.'

V. 2. It hath always been common for subjects, when required to confirm their engagements of loyalty and submission to the king, with a solemn oath; which should be conscientiously observed. But some think that the words may relate to the limits of a man's obedience: he must obey the king, as far as he can consistently with performing his vows and duties to the King of kings. "Take "heed to the mouth of the king, and to the word of the "oath of God." (Old. Trans.)

V. 3—5. The royal and sacred Teacher here counsels his readers, not to leave the presence of the king under the impulse of anger and passion; or hastily to withdraw from his service; or obstinately to persist in or justify any criminal practices: for a king who has absolute power, need only give the word, and his mandates and menaces would at once be executed; and none would be able or indeed authorized to call him to an account, or to "say to "him. What doest thou?" A quiet obedience in all things lawful would best ensure exemption from punishment: and the self-knowledge and experience of a wise man would enable him to discern the proper times and opportunities of remedying abuses, obtaining redress of grievances, and carrying any useful point, by judicious, lenient, and submissive measures; which could not be done by force and violent means, against a superior power.

8 There [r] is no man that hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit; neither hath he [s] power in the day of death: and there is no * discharge in that war; [t] neither shall wickedness deliver those that are given to it.

9 All [u] this have I seen, and applied my heart unto every work that is done under the sun: [x] there is a time wherein one man ruleth over another to his own hurt.

10 And [y] so I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from [z] the place of the holy, and [a] they were forgotten in the city where they had so done: this is also vanity.

11 Because [b] sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily; therefore the heart of the sons of men is [c] fully set in them to do evil.

12 Though [d] a sinner do evil an hundred times, and his days be prolonged, yet [e] surely I know that it shall be well with them that fear God, which [f] fear before him:

13 But [g] it shall not be well with the wicked, [h] neither shall he prolong his days which are [i] as a shadow; because he feareth not before God.

V. 6, 7. To accomplish any good design, times must be observed and judgment exercised. But as men, through ignorance or negligence, commonly let opportunities slip, and attempt things unseasonably and injudiciously, they involve themselves in manifold troubles, which might have been avoided: and when the eternal world is taken into the account, it may be said that this is the chief cause of the final misery of mankind. Many things relating to the future cannot be foreknown; nor can any one discover them to us: and about those in which foresight might be of use, men in general are heedless and inattentive. Thus all things seem involved in uncertainty, and no suitable preparation is made for those events which are coming upon them.

V. 8. The preceding observations are peculiarly applicable to death and its consequences. No foresight can discern the time of a man's departure: men know, however, that they must die, and yet they seldom prepare for that important season! No man hath power over the spirit, to retain the spirit, or rational soul, when God commands it to quit the body; no authority or bodily strength can stand any man in stead at that hour; no one can decline the conflict with that tremendous enemy, or find any weapon with which he may successfully resist him; and the wickedness, by which men set God at defiance, will not by any means defend them from the power of this his messenger and executioner. This is the more common and obvious interpretation: yet some understand the verse in another sense; 'As good advice to princes, not to abuse 'their power; but remember, first, That, he hath no 'dominion over men's spirits. Next, he cannot com 'mand them long; for death will irresistibly seize on him, 'as well as on the meanest man. Nay, he cannot rule 'the chances of war; and neither his policy nor his 'power shall be able to defend him from the vengeance 'that will be taken of the injustice, cruelty, and impiety, 'which he exercises in his government.' (Bp. Patrick.) This is, indeed, one way of applying the text: but the preceding interpretation appears to me more exact and comprehensive.

V. 9, 10. To abate the ambition of some for power, and the envy of others at their success, the wise man here observes, that, in the course of his careful and accurate observations, he had remarked instances, in which one man had exercised absolute authority over others, not only to their hurt, but especially to his own. So that, while he was proceeding in his course of successful tyranny, he came to an untimely end; and all his pomp and magnificence ended in a premature death, after which he was soon forgotten, or remembered with contempt and abhorrence. —"The place of the holy," may mean the courts of justice, to which the wicked ruler came, and from which he returned, with great state, and surrounded with admiring multitudes; while he professed to administer justice, as the vicegerent of the holy God. But some interpret the clause of the sanctuary, that holy place where sacrifices were offered to God, and where the wicked ruler cloaked his oppression with the appearance of piety. Some understand the latter verse to mean, that wicked rulers often died in peace, and had a splendid funeral; that their wickedness was soon forgotten, even in the place where it had been committed; and that it was indeed a vanity, that an oppressor and tyrant should fare as well as a just and clement prince.

V. 11—13. The denunciations of divine wrath against sinners not being in general executed immediately when the crime is committed, they who perhaps trembled at first, when they committed perjury, robbery, murder, or other crimes, finding no harm come upon them, conclude that they shall escape with impunity, and so grow daring in their iniquity. The wickedness of men abuses the long-suffering of God into an occasion of more desperate crimes, and their hearts are wholly bent to commit evil of every kind. Whereas, if God should cut off every criminal by some tremendous judgment, as soon as ever he had violated his commandments; men would be afraid to run into such excesses, as they now do without fear or shame. But though the ungodly should perpetrate multiplied and aggravated crimes, and their lives should be continued in outward prosperity; yet Solomon assuredly knew that it would be well with those who feared God, and walked before him in his ordinances and commandments, from a reverential awe of his authority, justice, and heart-searching presence: but that it could not be well with the wicked; for they must needs be disquieted with their own passions, and rendered uneasy by remorse and terror: and their most durable prosperity would flee away like a shadow, and expire as a short reprieve: and then just vengeance would come upon them for their contempt of God.

V. 14, 15. In the course of human affairs upright godly men are often involved in those troubles which are the general effect of vice: being visited with pain, disease, or poverty; or despised, reviled, and hated: and wicked men prosper and are caressed, as if they were the peculiar favourites of God and man. This observation caused Solomon again to recommend a moderate use of worldly things, with a cheerful and contented mind: this he regarded as the greatest advantage which can be made of all below the sun. Amidst all changes, such a frame of mind, if the result of right principles, might be preserved; and be the recompense and solace of all his labours in this evil world. Some, indeed, think that Solomon records this as the corrupt inference which he drew from the afflictions of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked; whilst he was a wanderer from God and his service. 'If this be the 'case,' says he, 'let us indulge ourselves; let us eat, 'drink, and be merry; for wisdom, and righteousness have little advantage of folly and madness; and the pleasure that a man hath enjoyed, is the only thing of which 'he may not be robbed.'

V. 16, 17. Solomon here records the result of his perplexing researches into the affairs of men, and the purposes and works of God. Examining with great attention into the employments of mankind, he found that many of them scarcely allowed themselves rest or sleep, day or night; and yet their anxiety seemed very unprofitable and vain! And when he inquired with similar diligence into the works of God, he found he could not comprehend or explain them all. He was persuaded that no application or capacity would enable a man to fathom the depths of the divine dispensations, in the government of this lower world. Some think that Solomon meant himself as an anxious inquirer into these subjects, when he mentioned him who "neither day nor night saw sleep with his eyes," because he was restless and unwearied in his fruitless investigation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

None of the rich, the powerful, the honourable, or the accomplished of the sons of men, are equally excellent useful, or happy, with the wise man. For who else can interpret the words of God, or deduce the proper instructions from his truths and dispensations? Wisdom confers the most permanent amiableness, and engages the most durable esteem; it softens the manners of the severe, and it gives boldness to the timid in the path of duty. May we choose and seek this wisdom, whatever we lose or come short of; and with all our getting, get 'a good understand-'ing, in the way of godliness!' The wise man will obey the king and those in authority, and he will charge others to do the same; he will be conscientious in his subjection, as a part of his obedience to God; and not trifle with oaths or solemn engagements. Common prudence indeed will teach a man to avoid unequal contests with those who are too powerful for him; and to shun exasperating language concerning such as give no account of their conduct. But the wise man will be submissive from higher principles: out of regard to the honour of God and the credit of his profession, he will repress all railing and indecent censures of such as administer public affairs; he will engage in no virulent opposition or hasty measures; he will continue in his place and station; he will not enter upon, much less persist in, any turbulent attempts; nor needlessly expose himself to the anger of the ruler. But if this be wisdom, and the reverse folly; what madness must it be for us weak and dependent creatures, to persist in rebellion against the Almighty, who doeth what he pleaseth, who speaketh with power, and giveth no account of his matters! Here especially unreserved subjection is our only wisdom: he that keepeth his commandment, to repent, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance, shall feel no evil thing: the wise man's heart will discern, that now is the time to seek pardon and peace, and to prepare for the day of final retribution. But, alas, what numbers slip this opportunity; from an erroneous judgment of things present and future, and bring misery upon themselves both in this life and that which is to come! As they cannot foresee, and none can certainly inform them of, future events, they think themselves justified in utterly neglecting the preparation for death and judgment; and so these overtake them unawares, and sink them into irreversible misery. "Oh, that men "were wise, that they understood these things, that they "would consider their latter end!" For death will come shortly, and perhaps suddenly: and no power, prosperity, courage, or prudence can avail a man in that day, when God shall require his soul. The believer alone is prepared to meet the solemn summons without dismay: to him the king of terrors will appear disarmed of his sting, and his grim countenance be softened into a smile: when he placidly yields to the stroke of death, he resigns his soul into his Redeemer's hands, and confidently expects the period, when that conqueror of fallen man shall be swallowed up in victory. But with what horror will the wicked discover, that neither their daring presumption, nor their artful schemes of villany, can retard the approach of this dreadful foe! Nay, frequently their crimes accelerate, as well as add anguish to, this distressing season; and thus "the wicked "ed is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous "hath hope in his death." If this be the end of all men, as to this present scene, and an eternity of happiness or misery is to succeed; our grand concern is to know, that "when "our earthly tabernacle shall be dissolved, we have an house "not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

V. 9—17.

Careful observers of mankind will find that those abuses of power, which injure others, are still more hurtful to the tyrant himself: and if, after a vexatious and mischievous life, a man must be put off with a grave for his body and infamy on his character, all must needs be vanity. Nay, should any man live in ungodly prosperity to extreme old age; and then die in outward peace, and have his crimes concealed or varnished over by a pompous funeral, a panegyrical oration, a splendid monument, and a lying inscription: all would still be vanity. Wicked men may indeed misconstrue and abuse the long suffering "of God, be-"cause sentence against an evil work is not executed "speedily;" and they may be emboldened in iniquity by impunity: but they will find that in his own season, and according to his own infinite wisdom and justice, he will certainly execute on them his most tremendous threatenings. And faith will assure us, that it will certainly be well, in time and to eternity with the conscientious worshipper and servant of God: and that they must be miserable who have no fear of him before their eyes. Let us then pray for an increase of faith; that we may view eternal things as near, real, and infinitely important. This alone can establish the heart in this mixed scene, in which the righteous often suffer, and the wicked prosper. But instead of saying with the epicure, "let us eat, drink, "and be merry, for to-morrow we die;" or on the other hand, murmuring against the appointments of God, and indulging vain objections; let us seek for a lively hope, a submissive will, and a contented mind: then leaving the Lord to clear up all difficulties in his own time, we may cheerfully enjoy the comforts, and bear up under the trials of life, for the few days, which we are to pass "under the "sun:" whilst peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost will abide within us, through all outward changes, and even when flesh and heart shall fail. And trusting in the mercy and truth of God in Christ, we should give him credit for his wisdom, justice, and goodness, where we cannot discern them. Thus we shall escape the perplexity and presumption, which must unite with all attempts to unravel the intricacies of his providential government. For the most acute and penetrating minds, using the most unwearied diligence, must fail of comprehending all his works and ways. Secret things belong to him, and only revealed things to us. Our studies therefore to be wise above what is written must involve us in sin and perplexity, and can never lead to any satisfactory conclusions. But to believe and obey here, will be a preparation for that world hereafter, where "we shall know, even as also we are known."

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1—3. Though Solomon could not find out the whole work of God; yet his inquiries led him to many useful conclusions, which he declared for the benefit of others. For he was assured, that the righteous and the wise, and their works, were under the special care of God; and that they would be favoured with that measure of success and usefulness which he saw best. Yet the events of human life were so intricately and mysteriously arranged, that no man could decide concerning himself, or another, whether he were the object of God's special love, or under his wrath, by any outward occurrences. The Lord in his manifold wisdom sometimes afflicts, and sometimes prospers, both the righteous and the wicked, without any exact discrimination: no kind, degree, or continuance of outward affliction can be mentioned, from which a godly man is certainly exempted; or of worldly prosperity, but wicked men have enjoyed it. And yet prosperity is by no means the uniform lot of the wicked, or adversity of the righteous. But matters are so varied and blended together, that all things may be said to come alike to all: and one event to befal the most unjust, selfish, sensual, and impious; and the most upright, kind, pure, and pious, who walk in the ordinances, and reverence the holy name, of God, as well as act honestly and blamelessly among men. The difference betwixt them, as to present happiness, arises not from outward causes, but from the inward supports and consolations which the righteous enjoy, and the benefit they derive from these varied trials and mercies; and the inward remorse and terror that wicked men experience, and their growing more daring in impiety under all they meet with. For as this state of things appears grievous, and often proves a temptation to the righteous, it exceedingly forwards the destruction of the wicked. As far as the sons of men are left to themselves, their hearts are full of evil; and prosperity in sin causes their lusts to rage even to madness: thus they are led to set God himself at defiance by their impieties and daring crimes; and they proceed in this course, till death closes their career, their hope expires with their breath, and they join the company of those that before have perished in their sins.

V. 4—6. Whilst life continues, an afflicted man may expect better days, and the conversion of the vilest sinner may be hoped for. In this view life is very valuable; and the proverb is applicable, that "a living dog is better than "a dead lion." The condition of the meanest or most despicable living man is preferable to that of the most noble and renowned of those who have died impenitent. For the living, being sure that they must die, may perhaps prepare for that solemn event: but the dead have no further knowledge of any thing here on earth; they have no further recompense of their worldly labours; they are soon forgotten; and the love, hatred, or envy, which they bare to others, and others to them, with all their pleasant or painful effects, are done with for ever, as far as this world is concerned: and, however rich and great they were, "they have no longer a portion for ever, in any thing that is done "under "the sun." Of this Solomon doubtless is to be understood: his scope is to show the vanity of earthly things, and the madness and folly of a wicked life, of which all the benefits must speedily be relinquished for ever. Nor would either the righteous be perplexed at the transient afflictions they meet with, or the wicked hardened by their fading prosperity; if they recollected how soon all this will end, and that a state of eternal retribution will succeed. (Note, viii. 11—13.)

V. 7—9. Solomon, having spoken to the case of the wicked, here returns to the wise and religious, whom he had before mentioned (1:) and he exhorts them to a cheerful confidence in God, who will be sure to do well to those whose works are accepted of him. They should therefore seek to possess a peaceful conscience, a lively hope, and a contented mind: and in this case they might enjoy, with comfort and gratitude, the bounty of Providence, whether they were rich or poor. They needed not to go as mourners all their days; but might be clothed in white garments, and use fragrant ointments, as was customary on festive occasions: for they alone had cause for gladness of heart. They were not required to refrain from a liberal use of their possessions, (so it were with temperance and charity,) either out of penuriousness, or distrust, or from a superstitious notion that religion consisted in a painful austerity. Let them use the comforts, and bear the burdens of the day, and not be solicitous about the morrow. It would also lessen the uneasiness of life, to have a companion of its comforts, and a solace of its sorrows, in a beloved wife. Though Solomon himself had so multiplied wives; yet he here uses the singular number, and says "the wife whom "thou lovest;" as one sensible of his folly in that matter; (Prov. v. 15—20.) He recommends it to a man to live with this one beloved wife with cheerfulness, making the best of present things, avoiding impatience and gloomy despondency, as dishonourable to God, and tormenting to himself. A few days of life are given to man on earth; and sin has made them vanity. But he may yet find many comforts, as his present portion, and the recompense of his labours: and it would be both foolish and ungrateful to lose the benefit of them, by fretting over his crosses, or anticipating future calamities.

11 ¶ I [b] returned, and saw under the sun, [c] that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, not yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill, [d] but time and chance happeneth to them all.

12 For [e] man also knoweth not his time: [f] as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are [g] the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

13 ¶ This [h] wisdom have I seen also under the sun, and it seemed great unto me:

14 There [i] was a little city, and few men within it: and there came a great king against it, and besieged it, and built great bulwarks against it:

15 Now there was found in it a poor wise man, and he by his wisdom delivered the city, [k] yet no man remembered that same poor man.

16 Then said I, [l] Wisdom is better than strength: nevertheless [m] the poor man's wisdom is despised, and his words are not heard.

17 The words [n] of wise men are heard in quiet, more than the cry of him that ruleth among fools.

18 Wisdom is [o] better than weapons of war, but [p] one sinner destroyeth much good.

V. 10. Man's wisdom in this dying world, consists in cheerfully using present comforts, and diligently attending to present duties. Whatever any one is convinced ought to be done by him, for the benefit of himself, his family, the church, or the world; according to his rank, station, talents, and opportunities; he ought to set about it without delay, and to pursue it without remissness, and to the utmost of his abilities: he ought not to yield to weariness or discouragement, because of opposition, difficulties, or hardships: and he should redeem his time for such purposes, remembering that he is hastening to the grave; and then all opportunities of this kind will be over, seeing there is no work, nor contrivance, nor knowledge, nor wisdom there. And even in the eternal world there will be no opportunity of glorifying God by doing good to man, as there is now on earth. The original is Sheol, the Septuagint Hades, which may as well be understood of the invisible world as of the grave.

V. 11, 12. The wise man next observed another cause of vanity in worldly things. Men's success seldom corresponds to their probable expectations of it. The swiftest do not always win the race; for they may fall, or be impeded in their course: battles are not determined according to the number, valour, or conduct of the contending parties: knowledge and prudence are so far from ensuring riches to the possessor, that they often fail of procuring him a subsistence: and the most skilful in any trade, science, or profession, are far from sure of being most favoured or employed. But there are favourable or unfavourable times into which men are cast: the former often procure success to far inferior talents and exertions; under the latter, no abilities or efforts can prevent disappointment. There are also various events which cannot be foreseen, that determine a man's success in any enterprise, and have a decisive effect upon his lot in life. These seem to come by chance; yet they are the appointment of God: but they who do not regard him, charge them on fortune, and exclaim against this imaginary being, as blind, capricious, or partial. These things, however, are thus ordered on purpose, that ungodly men might be left wholly in uncertainty. There is a time allotted to all men, in which to seek and obtain the most important advantages: but in general they know not, or observe not, that time, but suffer it to slip past them unimproved; and then they are involved in unforeseen calamities, as fishes and fowls are in the net or snare, and the time of trouble and of death comes upon them suddenly, so that they cannot escape. This is the case, especially with those who postpone the great concerns of their souls to some future opportunity: they are often given up to a strong delusion; and are caught in Satan's net, which he baits with some worldly object, for the sake of which they reject or abuse the Gospel, and go on in sin, till they suddenly fall into everlasting destruction.

V. 13—18. Solomon illustrated his remarks from an incident that had fallen under his observation; in which great wisdom, with eminent success, had been shown for the good of others, without any advantage to the person himself. A mighty king came with every warlike preparation, to besiege a small city that was very feebly garrisoned, and yet he failed of success: for a certain poor man, by his sagacity, contrivance, and prudent management, delivered the city. But when the danger was over, and the poor man's assistance was no more wanted, he was totally neglected and forgotten, through the ingratitude of the citizens, and their contempt of his poverty. This event was a proof that wisdom is decidedly preferable to strength; and also that it would be a vain possession, if its recompense were from men: for when the emergency was over, the poor man's wisdom was despised, and his words were not heard. One reason of this is assigned: wise men speak with modesty and gentleness; and though their words are more attended to by a few, who derive great good from them, yet the vociferation, or plausible speeches of the ostentatious, go further with the ignorant and thoughtless multitude: such is man's folly, that the empty and conceited declaimer will frequently be most popular. Wisdom is indeed better than weapons of war: yet it is so much more easy to do harm than good, that one ungodly man, with a little subtlety, address, and fluency of speech, will often prevail against those of the most consummate wisdom, prevent the success of the best concerted plans, overturn the most prudent regulations, and speedily destroy the good that

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—10.

We ought not to think that our inquiries into the word or works of God are useless, because we cannot comprehend all mysteries, or explain all difficulties: for if we proceed with modesty or seriousness, we shall come to many satisfactory determinations; and shall continually be learning such things as may be useful to others also. When we have had suitable proof of any important truth, we should never waver or hesitate on account of objections: for, in every thing that relates to the incomprehensible God, we must expect difficulties which we cannot solve. In the midst of the varied and intricate dispensations in the affairs of men, it is of the greatest consequence to be established in the belief, that the wise and righteous are under the special care of the Almighty. If therefore we first seek his favour, and then regulate all our undertakings according to his revealed will, and put our concerns into his hands, we shall be sure that our great end will be answered, whether we meet with the expected success or not. But we shall either perplex or deceive ourselves, if we attempt to judge of our acceptance by external events: for this is not the rule which the word of God hath appointed. Forgetful of this, some believers increase their load of trouble, by construing their disappointments and afflictions into evidences of his displeasure, and by concluding that they are not his children, or he would not thus deal with them: and a far greater number of unbelievers mistake outward success, for the token and proof of his love to them. But, in this sense, "all things come alike to all, and there is one event to the "righteous, and to the wicked." Not that the Lord doth not give a decided preference to the good, and holy, and reverential worshipper above the profane and unrighteous: but because the complex reasons of his conduct, in dispensing adversity or prosperity to individuals, do not lie level with our capacities. He acts by perfectly wise rules, and according to one consistent plan: but its parts are so various and complicated, that to us they must needs appear confused. We are called to walk by faith: and they who have no faith, infer that the righteous will never have any decisive advantage above the wicked; and this occasions much of the evil that is done under the sun. Yet it would not be so, if "the hearts of the sons of men were not full "of evil; and if madness were not in them:" so that they are therefore glad of a pretence for indulging their lusts, and neglecting their duty. Thus they live and die befooled and infatuated, and are not aware of their madness in rebelling against God, till the scenes, which open to their view in the eternal world, awfully convince them of it. Let us bless God, that we are yet joined to all the living, where there is hope; and let us consider this as a counterbalance to all our troubles: and as we know that we must die, and that after death is the judgment, let us deem preparation for these solemn events the great business of our lives. Thus, when we leave this world, though we shall have no knowledge of, or portion in, any thing that is done under the sun; though we should be forgotten both by those who loved and those who hated and envied us, and all our competitions and pursuits on earth should vanish as a dream; we shall possess a better and a far more enduring substance. We should then seek acceptance with God for ourselves and our works, before we think of finding satisfaction in outward things: but when we have attained this we may go our ways, and eat our bread with joy, and drink our wine, or even our water, with a merry heart; for the meanest morsel coming from our Father's love, and in answer to our prayers, will have a peculiar relish. The believer, who is assured of his acceptance, has of all men the best right to be cheerful: peace and joy are his duty, as well as his privilege: nor does his religion debar him from any rational or desirable earthly enjoyment. It requires not celibacy, or solitude, or affected austerities; which are the inventions of Satan and Antichrist, in order to affright men from the yoke of Christ, as if it were intolerably galling. But whilst we cultivate the social affections, and endeavour to be agreeable to our friends and relatives; and take the portion assigned us to defray the charges of our pilgrimage, and so to bear our labours with resignation: let us not forget that our life here is vanity, and a few days of vanity; that all our enjoyments and possessions are passing away; and that we must seek nobler acquisitions, as the portion of our souls in the eternal world. We should then use all these things according to the rule of God's law, and in subserviency to his glory: and whatever our outward adorning or indulgence be, we should be careful that our spiritual garments be always white, and free from spot or blemish; and that we be continually anointed, adorned, and refreshed, by the influences of the Holy Ghost. Nor may we permit either the comforts or the trials of life to render us inattentive to our various duties. We have each a work to do. Sinners have the salvation of their souls to seek after, and the assurance of that salvation: believers have a great work to do, in order to evidence their faith, adorn the Gospel, glorify God, and serve their generation. Magistrates, ministers, the rich and the poor, the learned and unlearned, in their various situations, may all find some work to do; and they are called to do it with their might, and to the utmost of their abilities. The speedy approach of death should cause us to quicken our pace, and double our diligence in our proper employment: seeing "there is "no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the "grave whither we are going," and to which we approach every moment. Alas! how wretched are they whose bodies are conveyed to the tomb, and their souls into an eternal state, before they have properly begun the great work of life! And if sorrow could enter heaven, methinks believers would there mourn over their lost opportunities of doing good to their fellow-sinners on earth.

V. 11—13.

Whilst we guard against supineness and procrastination; we should also beware of self-dependence in our undertakings; otherwise we shall meet with disappointment and vexation: for every one may observe, in all places under the sun, that no abilities or external advantages can ensure success. Happy then are they whose works are in the hands of God: he will give success to them if that be best; or he will recompense the intention when unsuccessful: he appoints that "time and chance which happen to all men:" he enables to run the race, and then confers the prize: he gives strength and victory, wisdom and favour, opportunity, and understanding to embrace it; grace and glory, and every other good thing to them that walk uprightly. But they who know not his accepted time, and the day of their visitation, who do not seek him whilst he may be found, and so waste their lives in the pursuit of earthly vanities, will be inextricably entangled in the snare of Satan, and perish suddenly without remedy. Whatever opportunities we may slip, whatever advantages we miss, and whatever calamities befal us, through unforeseen and apparently casual events, or our own impolicy: if we be but careful not to neglect the salvation of our souls, a few days will set all right. But superior talents, and even great success, will be a mere vanity to him, who neglects the one thing needful. Nay, even the good works of wise and pious men often expose them to present vexations. If we would not be rendered uneasy by perpetual disappointments, we must not expect much gratitude from men, for the most disinterested and beneficial services; but learn to do good from a regard to the honour of God, and in hopes of his gracious acceptance. In this way we shall "not be weary "of well-doing, assured that in due season we shall reap, "if we faint not." Wisdom and grace are indeed far more valuable than wealth, power, weapons of war, or any external accomplishments: yet they are seldom much respected in the poor and obscure. Under urgent distresses indeed, men will sometimes regard the counsels of a poor wise man; and be willing to use his superior skill, to serve a present turn, or promote their own interest. But when such friends are no more wanted, they will rarely be remembered: nay, they may assure themselves that their wisdom will by numbers be despised, and their words disregarded. For men are so attracted by glare and noise, that the magnificent, the forward, and the loquacious, will ever be the favourites of the ignorant unthinking multitudes with which the world abounds, and bear rule among them: and the wise must be contented to speak in quiet, and with effect, to the few, who are more desirous to profit, than to be flattered and amused. And this is not only the common case in popular assemblies; but even in those places where men meet together to hear the word of God: they often prefer a smooth doctrine, and are more attentive to the embellishments of the preacher, than to his important message. Thus ministers are tempted to accommodate their discourses to the corrupt taste of the audience; and in this way especially "one sinner destroyeth much good," and disseminates loose doctrines, to the deception of many souls, and the great scandal of the Gospel: whilst "many "follow his pernicious ways, by means of whom the way "of truth is evil spoken of." But whilst we lament these ruinous follies and mistakes of mankind; let us watch against ingratitude to our benefactors, especially to any poor man who hath been useful to us; let us learn to judge of men by their wisdom and piety, and not by their wealth or splendour; let us submit to the will, and depend on the power and mercy, of our God; and then none of our labours will be in vain, however now neglected. And seeing that the great Deliverer of sinners from the wrath to come and from the power of Satan, when he became poor for our sakes, was so despised and hated, nay, even now is treated with so much ingratitude and contempt; and seeing we ourselves are so often forgetful of our obligations, and inattentive to his wise and gracious words: we have the less reason to complain, if we meet with similar treatment in this evil world.

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1. When the perfumer has compounded any precious ointment with great skill and attention; if he do not cover it carefully, the flies, attracted by the fragrancy, will be entangled in it, and there die and putrefy; and this will spoil the perfume, and render the ointment noisome. Thus when a man has acquired, with great care and pains, a high reputation for wisdom, or any other honourable qualification: if he remit his watchfulness, and be heedless, self-indulgent, or imprudent, only in a few instances, and those by no means heinous, they will tarnish his character and sink him into neglect. For in proportion as a person becomes conspicuous, he is the more strictly watched, great things are expected from him, and less allowance made for his infirmities: nay, envy and malevolence become more busy in reducing his character to the ordinary level; and in impeding those useful designs which his credit, if it had not been impaired, might have rendered successful. So that those mistakes which would scarcely have been counted blemishes in another man, will be deemed almost inexcusable crimes in him: and numbers will be gratified by detecting and exposing them.

V. 2, 3. A wise man's understanding is employed about the duties of his station, and his heart is in his work; it is his delight, and he does it earnestly, and he therefore learns to do it skilfully, as a man who uses his right hand. But a fool employs no contrivance, because he is heartless as to every good thing; he understands any subject better than his own profession, and any one's duty better than his own. So that he goes about his work, thus to speak, in a left-handed manner, and makes nothing of it. 'A wise man 'always takes honest courses; but a fool turns into by-'ways.' Nay, such persons discover their ignorance and folly on every occasion: they cannot take a journey, or walk abroad, but they run into such gross and evident errors, or engage in such disputes and projects, as expose them to every body; for they have not wisdom enough to conceal their own emptiness and mischievous dispositions.

V. 4. (Note, viii. 3—5.) If the prince have taken offence at the conduct of any of his subjects or officers, the wisdom of the person concerned consists in keeping his place, and quietly attending to its duties; not being influenced, either by resentment or fear, to recede, or to excite any commotions in the state. For a submissive healing conduct wins upon and pacifies those princes, who have been greatly and even justly displeased; whereas rashness and violence generally end in the ruin of the offending party.

V. 5—7. Solomon allowed that princes often occasioned many evils by their misconduct and neglect, which could not be vindicated, though they did not justify the disaffected. One abuse especially he had remarked, by which rulers became accessary to the crimes of others, and all the mischiefs which they perpetrated. Namely, when, from any selfish motive, or from partiality or caprice, they preferred inexperienced and imprudent men, from low stations, to the highest dignities; which they disgraced by their imperious, mercenary, and rash behaviour: whilst the nobles, whose rank, education, and knowledge of affairs, entitled them to consideration, qualified them for such eminent places, and rendered them superior to the mean oppressions practised by indigent upstarts, were degraded, and placed under the command of their inferiors; which is, as if slaves rode in state, and princes were required to walk a-foot by their sides to do them honour. Indeed it naturally gives umbrage, when men of inferior rank, though eminent for abilities, wisdom, and probity, are advanced above the nobles; but much more so, when the talents and dispositions of the favourites are as mean as their extraction. (Notes, Prov. xix. 10. xxx. 22.)

V. 8—10. The sacred writer appears, in these verses, to continue his discourse; and to caution subjects, when aggrieved by evils which proceed from the ruler, not to seek redress in a precipitate manner, or to yield to the suggestions of resentment and pride. This advice he enforces by apt illustrations. As he that diggeth a pit for another, may probably fall into it himself; so he who violently seeks the ruin of an obnoxious competitor, will probably compass his own destruction. He who breaks a hedge that divides between one man's field and another's, may expect to be bitten by a serpent that lies concealed in it: and thus, the man who attempts to break down the fences of law and authority, on account of some personal offence, may expect a fatal end. He that should attempt to remove the stones which served for land-marks, or that were too heavy for him, would probably be crushed by them: and so will he who attempts to subvert an established government. And if a man intends to cleave a knotty block of wood, he must first procure proper tools, and duly sharpen them, and then proceed cautiously and skilfully, otherwise he will endanger and weary himself to little purpose: thus they that would compass practicable and desirable alterations, should proceed with caution, and procure proper helpers, and use cool deliberation and steady preseverance; and not expect to carry matters by force and violence, which are not sufficient even to cleave a block of wood. In all these matters, wisdom is profitable to direct to proper means and occasions, and to prevent mischief, and a man's wearying himself in vain. 'Without wisdom, whatsoever 'a man taketh in hand, turneth to his own hurt.'

V. 11—15. The serpent was supposed capable of being charmed by certain incantations, which would prevent its biting; (Note, Psal. lviii. 5;) but otherwise it could not safely be meddled with: and those babblers, who by flattery, plausibility, and slander, insinuate themselves into the favour of weak princes, are no better than the serpent. In themselves they may indeed be as despicable as they are poisonous: but they have it in their power to do immense mischief, and must be opposed with great caution. They may be outwitted and supplanted; but it is dangerous to attempt overpowering them, for they do not care whom they destroy, if exasperated. In general the wise man will gain his advantage by speaking with gentleness, candour, and discretion: and in a manner suited to procure him favour. But the lips of the foolish man, as it were, dig a pit in which to swallow up himself. When he first begins to speak, he betrays his ignorance and impertinence: and if he meets with the least check, he is put off his guard, and becomes like a madman, in rage and abuse. It is in vain, therefore, to enter into any contest with him: for he is full of words, and will speak last, though his discourse be so perplexed, that no one can tell what he intends to do, or what he will say next, or how his impertinent discourse will end. And in like manner, when he undertakes the management of affairs, he is sure to weary himself to no purpose: for he is so inconsiderate and headstrong, that if he undertook a journey to some great city, he would neither be able to find the way, nor be willing to follow another's directions! So that nothing can hinder a wise man's prevailing against such a competitor; except his own indignation give the foolish man an advantage against him to crush him by violence.

V. 16—19. A prince, who is a child in years, or in ignorance, fickleness, and caprice, is a sore judgment from God to any nation: especially, when the nobles, who ought to be able and active statesmen and counsellors, begin and spend their days in sensual indulgence. But the land is especially favoured, and is likely to prosper, where the king is descended from noble progenitors, and inherits their capacity for government: or, as some explain the word, when he is a man of mature years and experience; and when his princes are temperate, and apply themselves to business. For as the sluggard lets his house go to decay for want of repairs, till the roof dropped through, and the whole moulders into ruins: so the kingdom, that is governed by careless and profligate rulers, must come to ruin. For whilst they are making feasts and indulging themselves in wine, as if they had nothing to do, but to laugh and be merry, the public treasure is wasted, the national defence is neglected, heavy taxes must be imposed, the people grow discontented, the enemies are emboldened, and every thing concurs to bring heavy calamities on the state. The money which such rulers waste in their luxury, and lavish on the companions of their revels and debaucheries, would have answered all the purposes of good government, and provided for every emergency: but, being thrown away, manifold oppressions, disturbances, and miseries must needs ensue, which a few drunken feasts will very illy compensate.

V. 20. Government, and the distinctions in society, are the appointments of God, and are productive of much good to mankind. Kings, magistrates, and great men, therefore, with all their defects, are entitled to respect and honour: and as none ought openly to revile and wish evil to them; so malice should not be indulged in the heart, or ill wishes allowed even in thought, against them, or vented in the most private manner. And men should remember, that secret discourses and combinations of this kind are often detected by means, almost as unlikely, as if a bird of the air should convey the intelligence to the parties concerned. Kings have their spies, where they are not suspected. Their ears are as long as their arms; and God himself often wonderfully brings treason to light.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

A reputation for wisdom and honour, is not only more valuable than precious ointment, but more difficult to be preserved from losing its good savour, and becoming offensive. (vii. 1.) Seeing we are never entirely secure against tarnishing our characters by one folly or other, as long as we live, this may be considered as an additional reason, why the day of a wise man's death is better than that of his birth: for when he dies, his reputation is established, and a sanction given to all that he hath laboured for the good of mankind; whereas the indiscretion of an unguarded hour, or an incidental transgression, may at any time bring all his endeavours and devices into disrepute. Every professed Christian, in proportion as he is zealous for religion, may be considered as "in reputation for wisdom and honour," and a little folly will be more offensive in him than in another. The world will watch him more narrowly, and censure him more severely; his profession condemns their principles and conduct, and excites their enmity; and therefore they will make no allowances for him. Every minister of the Gospel is, in a higher sense, "in reputation for wisdom and honour," he is "a city set upon a "hill, that cannot be hid:" his faithful preaching will condemn numbers, and they will watch for matter of accusation against him, that he may appear no better than they. How careful then should we be to avoid all appearance of evil! and how ready to make any sacrifice, rather than give a handle to those who seek to hinder our usefulness, by blasting our characters! In general, retirement is most eligible; for few are much in the way of temptation and observation, without in some degree weakening their own influence. As men arrive at greater eminence in these respects, they are more noticed, will be more severely judged, and their mistakes will be of more extensively bad consequence. Alas, how many have we heard of, whose examples have illustrated these observations! Men of eminent reputation for abilities, for zeal, piety, and usefulness; who have sunk into neglect, or even become a disgrace to the cause of truth, by being overcome by temptation, or perhaps unjustly suspected of some crime, for want of a proper attention to appearances! It is in such cases vain to exclaim at the censoriousness of mankind: we all ought to know that the world is censorious, especially towards religious characters; and for that reason to "provide for things honest, "not only in the sight of God, but also before men;" and by well-doing, to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, and to pray without ceasing for grace to enable us "to walk "with wisdom towards them that are without." A man's wisdom is evinced by his heart being engaged, and his ingenuity exerted, in his proper work; that he may be skilful and successful in it. How necessary then is it that ministers should give themselves wholly to their proper work; that they may be workmen that need not be ashamed, and that their profiting may appear unto all men! Indeed every man, who does not delight in God's commandments, will at length be proved emphatically a fool. But we meet with great numbers, among every class in society, who prove themselves ignorant and foolish upon every emergency: all their wisdom consists in plausible professions and artifices, which continually fail them; and their words and works betray their real characters to all around them. It is generally our wisdom peaceably to abide in our places in the community; to avoid giving needless offence, especially to our superiors; and, if we have inadvertently offended, to disarm resentment by submissions: for they who rashly engage in opposition to authority, seldom escape without some grievous calamity. In this evil world, we must expect that rulers, as well as others, will mistake and do wrong; and we should be prepared to make proper allowances. But they should be warned of their duties, and apprised of the imprudence and bad consequences of "setting folly in great dignity, and "causing the rich to sit in low place." Yet when such grievances are experienced, without great caution, men will incur far worse consequences in attempting to redress them. In every case resentment and pride are dangerous counsellors; and hasty and violent measures are seldom either equitable or expedient. They who seek the downfall of others, will themselves often fall into mischief: in attempting to break through customary rules and limits, immense dangers are incurred, and wisdom is not only profitable to direct us what ought to be done, but in what manner it may safely be attempted. Times and occasions must be waited for; prudent contrivance will go much further than brutal force; and they who attempt even salutary alterations, without having previously adopted suitable plans, and engaged proper instruments, will seldom succeed.

V. 11—20.

They who would do good, must not despise their opposers, though they be superficial and worthless. Men may do much mischief with so mean a capacity as could never have attained to any thing useful. A vain babbler wants neither power nor inclination to bite like a serpent. Gentle means are commonly most prevalent; and they whose words are soft and insinuating, who use the language of truth, piety, and goodness, will have most influence: whilst the vehement and endless vociferation, the furious passion, the boastings, railings, menaces, and mischievous madness, which many employ, only prove their own folly, prevent the success of their own purposes, and give their opponents the advantage against them. Such as are most full of words, seldom most abound in sense or prudence: and they who will have the last word in dispute, have seldom truth on their side; great talkers are frequently very defective when they proceed to action; so that they lose themselves in the plainest matters: and, alas, how many foolish men weary themselves with vain labour about religion, and will not know the only way to Zion, the city of our God! When the government of kingdoms devolves on those who are weak and wicked, we should remember that the Lord is displeased, and so use proper means of averting his indignation; and it becomes us to be thankful, when affairs of state are prudently and successfully managed. Alas! how many indulge sloth, and spend their time in feasting, intemperance, and vain mirth, to the ruin of their families and of their souls! and we need not wonder that the affairs of nations are often ruined in the same way: for though money is not worthy of being idolized, or even hoarded; yet it is too valuable to be wasted in vanity and luxury. It cannot indeed purchase pardon of sin, or spiritual grace and peace: but, in respect of outward concerns, it may be said to answer all things. Besides providing what is needful and convenient for ourselves and families, it will subserve a thousand purposes of benevolence, and even of piety. It may endow alms-houses, hospitals, and schools; it may educate and support ministers and missionaries; and no good work can well be accomplished without it. But very few men indeed hit the true medium in this respect: and many well-meaning persons deprive themselves of the ability of doing good to numbers, by an inconsiderate profusion; and whilst they shun the vice of covetousness, they run headlong into the opposite extreme. But wisdom teaches us to estimate every thing according to the benefit which may be derived from it, and to apply it to its proper use; to attend on the duties of our station, and not to intermeddle with matters that belong not to us: to avoid doing or speaking those things in secret, which being detected, might tend to our injury and disgrace; to curb every rising of malevolence, and to fear God, honour the king, and render unto every man his due.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1, 2. Solomon had repeatedly recommended a cheerful use of worldly things, as a remedy against their vanity: and here he adds an exhortation to the liberal use of them in acts of beneficence. The expression, "Cast thy bread upon the waters," may perhaps allude to the husbandman's casting his bread-corn, which he could illy spare, upon a marshy soil, or even on the waters that covered it; where apparently he had little prospect of a crop. Men should deduct a considerable proportion from their gains, earnings, and expenses, according to their measure of riches, to supply the wants of the needy, and even of the unworthy and ungrateful. This may seem like throwing their provisions into the waters: but it will certainly not be lost, and long afterwards they will reap the benefit of it. They are therefore exhorted to give a portion of their substance, not merely to one or two, but to seven or eight, to as many as occasion requires; and not to object that they have already given to this or the other person. And this they should do, under a conviction of the instability of human affairs; and as sensible that all their other possessions may soon be torn from them, but that this will be safe, and reserved for them, in all possible emergencies. 'Here again Solomon contra-
'dicts the vulgar principle upon which covetous wretches
'move. They think all is lost that is given away in 'charity: no such matter, saith the preacher, the fruit of
'it will be found hereafter, beyond what can be imagined!
'O, saith the covetous man again, I know not what will 'be hereafter;—therefore it is best to save whilst I may.
'No, saith the preacher, for that very reason give.' Acts xi. 28—30.) 'For thou knowest not how calamitous the 'times may shortly be, and then the good thou hast done
'will stand thee in greater stead than all the goods thou
'enjoyest: which perhaps may be taken from thee, and
'leave thee nothing to do good withal; but make thee
'an object of other men's charity; which no person hath 'greater reason to expect than he who, when he had 'wherewithal, was kind to others in that condition.'
—'When thou thinkest not of it, God will requite thee,
'either in this world, or in the next.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3—6. The clouds exhale the water, and it is treasured up in them, on purpose that they may empty themselves in watering the earth, and in diffusing plenty. Thus God enables men to get wealth, that they may do good with it: nor can their riches profit them, if they do not benefit others. Speedily they will be cut down as trees: and as the tree continues where it fell; so will men abide in that state in which death leaves them, and this will be according as they have, or have not, brought forth good fruit. Selfish men object to this duty, from their circumstances, families, or necessary expenses; and especially from the vices and ingratitude of the poor. But the husbandman, who should thus object to the plowing or sowing of his ground or reaping his crop, because the wind was cold or rough, or the clouds threatened rain, would miss his seed-time, and lose his harvest: and so will they who have always an excuse ready when a good work is proposed. Men are ready to say, we cannot tell in what manner we shall be repaid for the trouble and expense of our charity. But can they understand, how the spirit or soul is united to the body? or how the body is fashioned in the womb? And if a man be unable to understand these things, how can it be expected, that he should know the other works of God who maketh all? Every good action, therefore, which springs from a proper principle, ought to be considered as sowing the seed of a future harvest: true wisdom consists in doing this daily, and in every part of the day, without sparing trouble or expense: and if many endeavours to be useful terminate in disappointment, this should not be a discouragement: none can know which of all their attempts will be most successful, or be certain that it will not succeed.

8 But [p] if a man live many years, and [r] rejoice in them all: [s] yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. [t] All that cometh is vanity.

9 [u] Rejoice, O young man, [x] in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and [y] walk in the ways of thine heart, and [z] in the sight of thine eyes: but [a] know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.

10 Therefore [b] remove * sorrow from thy heart, [c] and put away evil from thy flesh: [d] for childhood and youth are vanity.

V. 7, 8. Ungodly men expect the comfort of life from health and prosperity, which are pleasant to the mind as light is to the eyes, and as the sun cheers us after a gloomy season. But should a man live many years, and enjoy every pleasure of life through them all, let him remember that this season will be soon over; tedious days of sickness and pain may precede death; and if these be his good things, an eternity of darkness and despair will follow. All this outward prosperity then is a mere vanity.

V. 9, 10. This address to young persons is peculiarly animated and affecting. Solomon supposes that they would not be convinced that all was vanity, until they had made the trial; that they would desire liberty and opportunity to pursue every pleasure, and to gratify every inclination, and regale every sense, during the vigour of youth; and that they were sanguine in their expectations of happiness. 'Well,' says he, 'follow the bent of your desires, wher-'ever they lead you: but be assured at the same time, that 'for all these things God will call you into judgment.' He then exhorts them seriously, to behave so in their youth, as may best remove, or prevent sorrow and disease in future years, and the wrath of God in a future state: or to guard against both the vehement passions of the mind, and the ungovernable appetites of the body: for childhood and youth are vanity. Even in that early period sickness and death may come, youthful pleasures are vain and empty, and even in childhood and youth the heart is very prone to sin and folly.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Nothing tends more to give us a sanctified and comfortable use of outward things, than liberal and well-directed beneficence. Every work and labour of love to others, for the Lord's sake, will prove advantageous to ourselves: the more abundantly we bring forth these fruits of faith and grace, the better we shall be prepared for every evil that can befal us on earth: and that which is thus expended, will be better secured, and bear higher interest, than any other part of our property. Unbelievers indeed think it all thrown away, as bread cast upon the waters: but faith knows it to be seed sown in well-watered land, which, after a time of patient waiting, will yield a plenteous increase. Unbelief therefore hoards against the evil day: faith lends it to the Lord, to be repaid when he sees it to be wanted. Unbelief, as the parent of avarice, resembles the clouds exhaling and retaining the waters: but faith, working by love, resembles the clouds dispensing their stores, and emptying themselves on the parched earth. The covetous man, however, will not part with his idolized treasures till death tears him from them. Then, as he lived to himself, he is cut down like a barren tree, and cast into the fire, there to remain for ever: but the believer, who hath lived to God, and brought forth fruit as a tree of righteousness, will flourish in the paradise of God for ever. Yet selfishness will continue to make excuses and objections: and the dread of present loss, self-denial, or inconvenience, renders men reluctant to every proposed method of doing good: thus they lose their seed-time and harvest, and their hoarded abundance will rise up against them for their condemnation at the last day. But let us rely on God's word, and leave him to make it good, in his own time and manner. Let the rich be liberal in these profitable services, and others according to their ability. Let not ministers be slack, or discouraged in their work because they do not see their prayers answered, and their labours blessed. Let them sow the good seed plentifully, and with perseverance, and they will find it after many days: the Lord works by them, at those times, and in those ways, of which they are not aware; they cannot tell which sermon or exhortation he may please to bless, or whether they may not all be useful. Let it suffice, that God will accept, and recompense every well-meant endeavour; and the whole will subserve the purposes of his glory, and the salvation of souls. And let no Christian be weary of well-doing, in every way. This will do more to render life comfortable, than carnal prosperity and pleasure. The light of the Sun of Righteousness and his healing beams, are far more pleasing to the believer's soul, than the light of the sun to his eyes: and though he must expect pain, sickness, and death, yet his Redeemer will not leave him comfortless: his Sun may be clouded and eclipsed; but it shall never go down to leave him in darkness and despair. Soon will the longest life of earthly pleasure expire: and how numerous and dreary will be the days, the years, the countless, endless ages of darkness, which await those who die in their sins! Let the careless and the carnal remember this, and prepare for their closing scene. Nor can young persons begin this needful work too soon. Whilst their spirits are lively and their hearts cheerful; let them so temper their joy, as to recollect continually the account they must give of their whole conduct. And let those, (alas, how numerous are they!) who determine to give a loose to every appetite, and rush into every scene of dissipation and vicious pleasure, to which they can have access, take this along with them, 'that God registers 'every one of their sinful thoughts and desires, their idle 'words, and wicked works; and will at last produce the 'account of millions of crimes, which they committed 'with their jovial comrades, and speedily forgot.' If they

CHAP. XII.

An exhortation to early piety; and a description of the infirmities of old age, and the approach and consequences of death, 1—7. A repeated declaration that all is vanity; the preacher's purpose and care in his instructions; and the solemn conclusion of his subject, in a charge to fear and obey God, as the whole of man, and thus to prepare for judgment, 8—12.

[a] REMEMBER now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, [b] while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, [c] when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them;

2 While [d] the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, [e] nor the clouds return after the rain:

3 In the day when [f] the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders * cease because they are few, [g] and those that look out of the windows be darkened;

4 And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and [h] all the daughters of music shall be brought low:

5 Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, [i] and the [k] almond-tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail: [l] because man goeth to his long home, [m] and the mourners go about the streets:

6 Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern.

7 Then shall [n] the dust return to the earth as it was; and [o] the spirit shall return unto [p] God who gave it.

would then avoid remorse, terror, and anguish in future years; if they would have hope and comfort on a dying bed; if they would escape temporal and eternal misery; let them learn to bridle their passions, in the fear of God, and in the view of this great season of retribution; let them remember the vanity of youthful pleasures, and the uncertainty of human life; and let them anticipate those reflections which, neglecting this advice, they may hereafter make on their own conduct, when oppressed with pain and terror, or when condemned at the tribunal of the righteous judge.

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. The word rendered Creator in this place is plural, and may refer to the expression used at the creation of Adam and Eve. "Let us make man;" (Notes, Gen. i. 26. Job xxxv. 10.) This exhortation is connected with the close of the preceding chapter. Instead of that vain and vicious conduct which tends to so many future evils, Solomon recommends an early attention to religion. In allusion to man's natural forgetfulness of God, he calls upon young persons to "Remember their Creator." They should remember his glorious perfections, as displayed in the work of creation; their own relations and obligations to him, and dependence on him, as their Creator and Lord; the duties thence resulting, and the account that they must render; the value of his favour, and the power of his wrath in whom they live, move, and are. They should remember their sins against their Creator, and repent and seek forgiveness of them: and their duties, and set about performing them, in dependence on his mercy and grace, and with a desire to live to his glory. This should be done, as early as may be, whilst the body is vigorous and the spirits active; and before those evil days or years approach, in which no pleasure can be found, except in communion with God and in the hope of heaven. At that trying season there will be no occasion for the additional anguish of reviewing a mispent life; repentance and conversion will be attended with peculiar and mighty difficulties: and the circumstance of not having renounced sin and worldly vanities, till a man be forced to say, "I have no pleasure "in them," will render his sincerity very questionable to his own conscience. The word rendered youth, seems to mean the best and choicest season of life.

V. 2—7. This figurative description of old age and its infirmities, has furnished the critics with much employment, and a fine field for the display of their ingenuity: but such matters must here be handled with great brevity. —In old age, the relish for all pleasures is lost, and men grow indifferent even to those objects which once occasioned the most agreeable sensations: so that the sun, with its pleasant light, and the beautiful moon and stars, are, as it were, obscured to them; or the understanding, imagination, memory, and judgment, the lights of the mind, are so impaired that they seem darkened. One affliction or pain succeeds another, as clouds return after heavy showers in a rainy season. The hands and arms, with which a man defends himself from assaults or accidents, as watchmen keep the house, grow feeble, and tremble when their help is requisite. The legs and thighs which, as strong men, support the body, seem in old age to bend under its weight. The teeth, which used to grind the food, are most of them gone; and the few that remain are become useless. The eyes, by which the soul looked as it were, out at the windows, grow dim. Men become disinclined or incapacitated to open their mouths in public debates, having lost their voice with their teeth: or they have no inclination to eat, as they cannot grind or chew their food, without pain and difficulty: or they keep at home and retired, their doors being shut towards the street because they cannot digest their food as formerly. Their rest is so easily disturbed, that they awake, and rise up, uneasy and alarmed, at the least noise, as the singing of a bird, or the crowing of the cock. The voice and the ear, those daughters of music, are no longer capable of performing their functions, or the spirits are too dull to let them attend with satisfaction. Every ascent in the way terrifies them, on account of the labour of climbing; they shun every high place through fear of falling from it; nay, they feel themselves so feeble and clumsy, that they dread being thrown down, or run over, whenever they walk out. Their heads, covered with white hair, seem to blossom like the almond-tree: every little inconvenience, like the weight, or the chirping, of a grasshopper, is a burden to them, and renders them fretful; or they are bowed down, so that their backbone projects like that of a locust, and they have no longer any desire after, or relish for, animal pleasures. Thus man draws nigh to the end of his journey, and will shortly be at his long home, or his home of ages. The grave may in some sense be thus called: but the eternal state of happiness or misery, to which the soul removes at death, and to which the body will follow at the resurrection, is far more emphatically so called. When this takes place, others will, either sincerely or insincerely, mourn for him, as he formerly did for others. Then the "silver cord will "be loosed:" which may mean the inexplicable bond of union betwixt body and soul; or the spinal marrow, which continues sensation by the nerves from the brain, to every part of the body. Or the whole verse may be a description of the functions of life, taken from a well; where is a cord to the bowl or bucket, with which the water is drawn, a wheel by which the more easily to raise it, a cistern into which it may be poured, and a pitcher, or vessel, to carry it away with; but now all are broken or loosened, and become useless. Thus at death the lungs cease to play, the heart ceases to beat, the blood to circulate; every vessel becomes useless, the whole surprising contrivance for forming and communicating the blood, which is the life, from the fountain of the heart to every extremity of the body, is now entirely deranged: the silver cord is loosed, the golden bowl is broken, the pitcher and the wheel are marred at once. Then the body returns to its dust, and the soul to God the Creator, to be fixed in a state of happiness or misery, according to the things done in this present life.

V. 8—10. In the view of this near approach of death, Solomon (who probably wrote this description from his own experience,) again declares that "all is vanity, and "vanity of vanities," (Note, i. 2:) and then he proceeds to close his subject in the most solemn manner. He had been renowned and eminent in all kinds of wisdom: but the best use he could make of it, was by continuing to teach the people knowledge. With great care and labour, he had sought out, arranged, and published many proverbs, for their instruction: he had bestowed pains to find out words suited to convey his meaning, in the plainest, most convincing, and agreeable manner to their minds; and what he had written was upright and true, and worthy of their fullest credence and strictest observance.

V. 11—14. The words which prophets and wise men employed in instructing the people, were intended to be as goads, which cause the sluggish ox to mend his pace when drawing in the yoke: they would therefore occasion pain whilst they alarmed the conscience, and showed men their guilt and danger; but they tended to quicken them in fleeing from the wrath to come, and in walking in the way to heaven. The masters of assemblies, the priests or prophets who taught the people when assembled at the temple or in other places; and who received their instructions from the one great Shepherd of Israel, intended them to be as nails, fastened in their memories, consciences, and judgments, so as not easily to be removed; that they might there remain, for their establishment in the truths and ways of God. Solomon, therefore, with the authority and affection of a father, exhorts every reader to be admonished by the instructions which he hath here given. To write a great many books was an almost endless work, not suited to the shortness of human life; and the study of the writer, and even of the reader, would in that case be a great weariness to the flesh. Nor was it at all necessary: for whatever books were written, or studies pursued, they would all be vanity and vexation; except they led to this, as the conclusion of the whole matter, that "to fear God, "and keep his commandments, is the whole of man." The word duty, is very improperly added in the translation; for it is the whole interest, privilege, honour, and happiness, as well as duty of man, to fear the wrath and seek the favour of God; to reverence his perfections, and to become his spiritual worshippers and servants, walking in all his ordinances and commandments, blameless. For after this vain life is over, another scene will succeed, and men shall be judged, and recompensed according to their conduct, secret as well as open, and whether good or evil. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

All the wickedness and misery of man spring from his forgetfulness of God, to which he is prone even from his youth. Though every object around us, and our own reason and conscience, and even existence, proclaim his power and Godhead; yet is he scarcely in our thoughts, whilst left to ourselves: and men in general remain ignorant or careless about their Creator and daily Benefactor; and neither fear, love, serve, nor trust him; as his glorious perfections and their infinite obligations to him demand of them. We need, therefore, to be called upon to remember our Creator, that we may perceive our need of a Redeemer and a Sanctifier; and may be excited to return to the Lord, by the way that he hath opened, that being reconciled to him, we may walk with Him through this evil world. We should also call upon our children and the thoughtless and inexperienced young persons around us, to attend to these neglected truths and duties; and remind them of the advantages of beginning this needful work in the dawn of life, and of the folly and hazard of neglecting it. It is a great happiness to be prevented from contracting those bad habits and connexions which render a change, in after years, like cutting off a right hand or foot: to avoid that injustice and mischief to others, which often distress the conscience to the end of life; to be secure from the danger of dying in sin, or of living to be hardened by its deceitfulness; or of having the great work of life to begin, when the evil days come, in which pains and infirmities destroy the comfort of every possession; and are a heavy load to bear, without the accumulation of so many sorrows, anxieties, and terrors, as must needs accompany a late repentance, in those few instances in which it takes place. Happy then are they who serve God from their early youth, and are useful through their whole lives; who have divine consolations to refresh them, when other comforts are withdrawn or become insipid; and who know, that "when flesh and heart shall fail, God will be the Strength "of their heart, and their Portion for ever!" If we are not previously cut off, a few years will terminate all that vigour, activity, or comeliness, about which we are so careful, and in which we are so apt to glory. The decay of our bodies will even obstruct the operations of our mental faculties: our dear friends and relatives will, one after another, be torn from our bleeding side: one pain and disease will succeed another; we shall become feeble and helpless as children; our limbs will totter under the weight of our bodies; every sense and organ will lose its power of giving pleasure; we shall not derive satisfaction from beautiful objects or prospects, from music, from food, or from any of the delights of the sons of men: every undertaking will then excite terror, weariness, or disquietude; our sleep will be broken and motion uneasy; and the trials of our patience will probably render us a trial to the patience of those around us. Every circumstance will then remind us, that we are speedily to remove to our long home, and that when the mourners have paid their customary tribute to us, we shall be little more thought of; whilst our bodies are mouldering in the grave, and our souls are fixed in an unchangeable state. Let us then seek the Lord and his salvation, before the vital powers fail, and "the dust return to the earth as it was, and the spirit "to God who gave it."

V. 8—14.

What a complicated vanity is life and all its pursuits, to that man whose treasure is on earth, and who has every thing to dread in a future world! But as it is a season to prepare for eternity, and to do good on earth, life is no vanity; and death to him who thus employs his days has no terrors: here only can we find substantial good. To teach man this knowledge is the work of every preacher: he who carefully attends to this, according to the Scripture, is wise, though his station be obscure and his abilities mean: and the man who possesses superior rank and talents, cannot more honourably employ them, than in copying the example of this wise and royal preacher; in devising proper means, and in seeking out acceptable words, even those of uprightness and truth, set forth in the most convincing and persuasive manner, in order to bring men to seek and serve God. But indeed the pure word of God, however set forth in acceptable language, must disquiet the negligent and disobedient; for it is "quick and powerful, "and sharper than a two-edged sword, and it pierces" the sinner's conscience, and fills it with terror and remorse. These are, however, faithful wounds, and intended to urge men forward in the way of salvation: and when they have produced their effect, peace and consolation will follow. All who are employed as masters of assemblies, or teachers of congregations, derive their authority, abilities, and instructions, from the one good Shepherd, who laid down his life for the sheep. Their endeavour should be to fasten divine truths, as nails, in the minds of their hearers, that they may abide with them, and make a durable impression: and the authority of him that sent them ought to be recognized in them and their message. They should, however, keep close to their instructions; for if the plain truths of Scripture do not produce the desired effect, nothing will. There is indeed no end of the volumes which are written and read with immense labour and fatigue: and instead of rendering men wiser, holier, or happier, they often increase their pride and contempt of God's word. But whether we consider honour, riches, pleasures, learning, or abilities: the man, who had them all in the greatest abundance, and tried them at the utmost advantage, pronounces them all to be vanity. Let us then be admonished by his words, and profit by his experience; let us learn from him the conclusion of the whole matter, that to "fear God, "and keep his commandments, is the whole of man!" let us then cease "being careful, and troubled about many "things," and attend to this "one thing needful, and "choose this good part that shall never be taken from us:" let us now come to him as a merciful Saviour, who will soon appear as an omnipotent and omniscient Judge; when "he will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and "manifest the counsels of all hearts," and judge the secrets of men; then shall we all appear before his tribunal, and "receive according to the things done in the body, whe-"ther they be good or evil." "Let us therefore give "diligence, that we may be found of him in peace, with-"out spot, and blameless."

SOLOMON.

THERE can be no reasonable doubt but that Solomon was the writer of this book, as well as of the two which precede: 'and that it was always looked upon as a holy book, treating of some spiritual and 'divine matter, appears from its being placed among the rest of that kind.' (Bp. Patrick.)—It is indeed evident, that it was received among the canonical books of the Jews, (probably by Ezra, an inspired writer,) soon after the Babylonish captivity; and that it formed a part of that sacred volume, which, in the time of Christ, was called "the Scriptures," and "the oracles of God."—It does not indeed appear that it was expressly quoted by any writer of the new Testament; yet the coincidence of its general argument, and of particular sentiments, with many passages in both the old and new Testament, is well worthy of consideration. (Ps. xlv. Is. liv. 5. lxi. 10. lxii. 4, 5. Hos. ii. 16—20. Matt. ix. 15. xxii. 2. xxv. 1—11. John iii. 29. 2 Cor. xi. 2. Eph. v. 23—27. Rev. xix. 7—9. xxi. 2. 9. xxii. 17.) (Compare also i. 4. with John vi. 44.—iv. 7. with Eph. v. 27.—v. 2. with Rev. iii. 20 —vii. 1. with Is. lii. 7. Eph. vi. 15.—viii. 11. with Is. v. 1—7. Matt. xxi 33. 43. —viii. 14. with Rev. xxii. 20.) This coincidence, joined with the general testimony both of the Jewish and Christian church, through a long succession of ages; (with but few exceptions, and those not peculiarly decided in respect of evangelical truth and piety,) gives the book a very high sanction, not only as genuine, but also as divinely inspired.—It may perhaps also appear to the attentive and serious reader, that the allegory itself is a kind of prophecy; and that particular passages, soberly explained, according to the known rules of interpreting allegories, are prophetical of the coming of Christ in our nature, the abolition of the Mosaic dispensation, the calling of the Gentiles, and the enlargement of the church, (ii. 9. 17. viii. 1. 8, 9;) and more than this cannot be expected from the nature of the composition.—We learn from the sacred historian, that Solomon wrote above a thousand songs; this, however, alone has been preserved as "The song of songs," the most excellent of songs; and though, as a poetical composition, it is allowed by the best judges to be finished in the highest style of elegance and beauty: yet the pious reader will be apt to think, that it was thus distinguished on another and superior account; namely, the excellency of the subject, and the admirable way in which it is treated. Learned men have bestowed much pains in showing the occasion on which Solomon wrote this sacred poem: and most of them imagine, that it was composed on his marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; but this is doubtful, (Note i. 2:) nor is it certain that it was written so early in his reign; for some think that the tower of Lebanon was not built till a considerable time after that event. (vii. 4.) In short, this song is a divine allegory in the form of a pastoral, which represents the reciprocal love betwixt Christ and his church, under figures taken from the relation and affection which subsist betwixt a bridegroom and his espoused bride; an emblem continually employed in Scripture. It hath some reference to the state of the Jewish church, as waiting for the coming of the promised Messiah: but it likewise accords to the fellowship betwixt Christ and true believers in every age. In order properly to understand it, we must consider the Redeemer as loving and beloved of his church. The marriage-contract is already ratified, but the completion of this blessed union is reserved for the heavenly state. Here on earth the believer loves and rejoices in an unseen Saviour, and seeks his happiness from his spiritual presence; Christ manifests himself to him as he doth not unto the world: and these visits are earnests and foretastes of heavenly joy. But they are interrupted, suspended, or varied on many accounts: they are often lost by negligence or other sins, and can only be recovered by humble repentance and renewed diligence: yet the love on both sides remains unchanged, as to its principle, though varied in the expressions of it.

These things are represented in a sort of dialogue; in which the church speaks of Christ, or to him; and he answers, and addresses the church: and the daughters of Jerusalem, (who seem to denote such as are inquiring after this salvation,) are frequently addressed, and reply; thus the varying experiences and correspondent duties, of the believer, are delineated in a very animating and edifying manner. But the book should be read with great abstraction of mind from outward things, and with much prayer: lest the carnal passions should be kindled, instead of the spiritual affections being invigorated. And, as it is impossible for any one to enter profitably into the meaning of the inspired writer, who has no spiritual experience of the subject; so an ungodly man will seldom read it with advantage, or indeed without detriment: nor is it any objection to the excellency and usefulness of this sacred poem, to allow that it is peculiarly capable of becoming "a savour of death unto death," to "those who wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction." The spiritual meaning, that is, the instruction intended to be given by the Holy Spirit speaking by Solomon, should then be principally inquired after: and too minute investigation of the external images, under which it is couched, or of the circumstances and arrangement of the poem, (according to the rules of modern criticism,) will, I apprehend, be found rather unfavourable to edification, than conducive to it. No doubt many expressions in it are very difficult to us, both as to the literal meaning, and the spiritual instruction intended by them, if such were intended: and some descriptions must not be judged by modern notions of delicacy, which in a very vicious age is apt to be fastidious: but the grand outlines soberly interpreted, in the obvious meaning of the allegory, so accord to the affections and inward experience of the lively Christian, that he will hardly ever read and meditate upon them, in a spirit of humble devotion, without feeling a conviction, that no other poem of the same kind, extant in the world, could without manifest violence, be so explained, as to describe the state of his heart, at different times, and to excite admiring, adoring, grateful love to God our Saviour, as this does.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. Solomon wrote many songs, all of which were doubtless finished in the most poetical manner: but this sacred allegory alone hath been preserved, and inserted in holy writ. It is "The Song of songs;" not only more excellent than all the rest of the songs of Solomon, but than any of those which had been composed by other writers; as it is wholly taken up with describing the glories and excellencies of the divine Saviour, and the love which subsists betwixt him and his redeemed people; which form the interior, most sublime, and heavenly part of true religion.

V. 2. In commenting on this book, I purposely omit most of that which many expositors have, with great labour and ingenuity, adduced, concerning the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter, a marriage-feast of seven, or more, days continuance, and various dramatical arrangements, adapted to these views of the subject. It does not appear to me, that a satisfactory proof has been given of any such intention in the writer. Solomon indeed married Pharaoh's daughter, soon after his accession to the throne, (Notes, 1 Kings iii. 1. 2 Chr. viii. 11.) but very little is said in the history concerning this transaction; so that the most of that which is confidently advanced about it is mere conjecture, the fruit of a lively invention. The book itself gives not the smallest intimation about Pharaoh's daughter: for the mention of the horses in Pharaoh's chariot, and the spouse's coming up out of the wilderness, (a wilderness lying between Egypt and Canaan,) will hardly be considered as arguments, by impartial reasoners. We might as well insist on it that she came from Syria, or Moab, because the Bridegroom calls her to come from Lebanon and from Hermon. (iv. 8.) No doubt many allusions are made to the customs then in use at marriages; and so there are in some places of the New Testament: but it has not yet been fully proved, that any of Solomon's marriages so much as gave occasion to this song, any more than that the marriage at Cana gave occasion to the parable of the ten virgins. But, supposing that Solomon's marriage did give the occasion: these questions would arise from the concession: Are we to consider his marriage as the primary subject, and the spiritual meaning as an accommodation? Or was the spiritual meaning eminently intended, and allusions made to the marriage only in order to convey the spiritual instruction to greater advantage? On the former supposition, I should be apt to think, that the primary meaning alone was intended; and should have little inclination to dilate in accommodating the circumstances of a mere epithalamium to spiritual purposes. On the latter, the instruction conveyed by the allegory, or parable, demands the expositor's chief attention, and the circumstances just so far as they lead to the right interpretation, and no further. If it be a sacred poem, the meaning of the Holy Spirit is primarily to be inquired after; and nothing is to be introduced which carries away the attention from that grand subject; much less any thing which indisposes the mind and heart for it: and, as far as I have examined, the glowing language even of those who would be considered as most cautious of this kind of interpretation, is much more calculated to excite wrong ideas and carnal passions, than Solomon's own words are. Firmly believing it to be a sacred allegory, I shall endeavour to explain it as such; and only mention the allusions to ancient customs, when they tend to illustrate the subject: and, it will appear, as we proceed, that many particulars cannot, without much violence, be properly interpreted of those external circumstances which are supposed to have given occasion to the book. It is also requisite here to observe, that many learned and pious expositors confine the interpretation to the church as a collective body; in a way which seems to disallow the application of it to the affections and experiences of individual believers. Yet the church is nothing else but a company of individual believers; (for hypocrits and formalists, whether in Israel or among Christians, could never sincerely join in the fervent and even rapturous expressions of holy love here used:) so that the language of the church is in fact nothing more than the language of those individuals who compose the church, according to their several stations and circumstances, duties, trials, and varied affections: and the distinction seems only to embarrass the subject. Some think that, in this verse, the ancient church expresses her earnest longings for the coming of the promised Messiah: but the fervent desires of believers after fellowship with the Father, and with "his Son Jesus Christ," are at least equally intended. The church of established believers may therefore be considered as speaking in the allegorical character of the bride or spouse of Christ;—and 'in the most passionate strain 'wishing for some tokens of love, which is expressed under the metaphor of a kiss. But there is no mention at 'all made of the name, condition, or beauty of the person, 'whose love is desired; nor any account of the beginning 'or progress of this desire: but he, (Solomon,) makes 'her burst out on a sudden, and abruptly, into these words, "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth;" that he 'might the more artificially describe the nature and force 'of divine love; which, when it possesses the mind, snatch-'es it so from itself, that it is wholly in him that it loves. 'It thinks of nothing else, wishes nothing, speaks of nothing, 'but this alone; and imagines that every body else thinks 'of the same, and knows of whom it speaks.' (Lam. iii. 1. John xx. 15.) (Bp. Patrick.) "The kisses of "his mouth," evidently mean those cheering assurances of reconciliation and endeared love with which believers are from time to time favoured, especially when deeply humbled for their sins: in the midst of their fears and distresses they obtain such discoveries of the Redeemer's glory and grace, and of his power and willingness to save, as dispel their sorrows, and fill them "with peace and joy in "believing," and cause them "to abound in hope by the "power of the Holy Ghost." Of these sweet consolations the spouse here speaks, and longs for their renewal, increase, and continuance. And then, addressing herself to him, as if present, of whom she before spake as absent, she adds, "for thy love is better than wine." The assurance, the pledges, the consolations of the love of Christ, producing reciprocal love to him, give higher and more exquisite pleasures, than can flow from the exhilaration of wine, or from any animal indulgence.

V. 3. The glorious excellencies of the Redeemer's person and character; the unction of the Holy Spirit without measure; the condescension and love of his undertaking in behalf of sinners; the suitableness and preciousness of his righteousness, atonement, and mediation, and of all the offices he sustains for our benefit, render his name more pleasant to the believer's heart, than the costliest unguent or perfume could be to his senses. The more the truths concerning Christ are examined or explained by the preaching of the Gospel, or by reading and meditation, the higher delight in his excellencies is excited: even as the fragrancy of the ointment is most perceived, when by pouring it forth the house is filled with its odour. On these accounts, all uncorrupt and upright souls, (4.) love the Lord Jesus, in proportion to the degree of their purity, simplicity, and entire devotedness unto the worship and service of God. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4. The thoughts of the excellency of Christ, may be supposed here to remind the spouse of her want of conformity to him; and she longs to follow him more nearly, and be more like him, and more drawn off from all other objects. But she feels also her inability to this, without his special grace: and therefore entreats him to "draw her" especially by the quickening influences of his Spirit: and then she will "run after him," in the ways of holy obedience. Nay, she says "we will run after thee;" intimating, perhaps, that she should then be enabled to keep up with those believers who now were far before her in love and holiness; or that she should be enabled to induce and encourage others to run in the same blessed course. Such expressions seem not to have much meaning in any literal interpretation. 'The whole verse may be understood after 'this manner: the first words, "Draw me," are the voice 'of the spouse; the next, "We will run after thee," the 'words of the chorus of virgins: and then she speaks 'again; "The king hath brought me into his chambers;" 'and then they express their joy, "We will be glad and "rejoice in thee." (Bp. Patrick.) Some here consider the spouse as the ancient church of Israel, praying for the Saviour's coming; and the virgins, (2) as converts from among the Gentiles; who would then join themselves in vast numbers to the believers of the Jews, and with great alacrity follow him as his zealous disciples. We learn from the other part of the verse, that the person before spoken of was the king, even that King of Israel, whom Solomon in all his glory feebly represented. The spouse had experienced the comforts of his condescending love and gracious presence; and expected still more endeared and intimate communion with him; and, with all her attendants, resolved to rejoice in him, "remembering his love (or loves, the token and expression of his love,) "more "than wine." Yea, not only we, but all "they who up-"rightly love thee," will thus rejoice in thee. (Marg. Reading.)

V. 5, 6. The daughters of Jerusalem, may here mean such persons as associate with believers, and favour the cause of the Gospel, but are not yet established or experienced in the faith: though some consider them as part of the Jewish professed church; and others as 'foreign congrega-'tions,' which is not at all probable. The spouse, however, aims to prevent them from being stumbled by what they witnessed of her circumstances. In some respects she was blackish as the weather-beaten tents of the Arabian shepherds: but in others, she was comely as the magnificent curtains in the palaces of Solomon. The original word signifies dark, as the early dawn. The believer is indeed black by nature; but he is comely, as renewed in part by grace, to the holy image of God; still, however, he is deformed with great remains of sin; but comely, as "accepted in "the Beloved," "and made the righteousness of God in "him." He is contemptible and base in the esteem of men, but honourable and excellent in the judgment of God. He is often poor, unlearned, of mean abilities, and employed in low occupations, for which men despise him: but he is a king and a priest unto God, walks with him, and is his child and the heir of his eternal glory. The visible church also is deformed by a large intermixture of hypocrites; and by manifold scandals, heresies, divisions, and controversies, which prevail in almost every part of it: yet the invisible church, which consists of the remnant of true believers, forms "a holy nation, a peculiar people, zealous of good "works." Some of these things may here be implied: but it is more immediately meant, that the afflictions of believers and the persecutions of the church, render them base in man's esteem, but comely in the eyes of the Lord. The spouse therefore advises the daughters of Jerusalem not to look at her, neither to disdain her on account of her infirmities or external meanness and distresses, or to take any prejudice against religion on that account. If they saw her black, it was because "the sun had looked upon her;" that is, she had endured temptation and persecutions for her relation to Christ. Men, brethren to her by nature, or hypocritical professors, brethren in name, were enraged at her, because of the favour shown her, and her attachment to her Beloved: and they had compelled her to endure the greatest hardships, and do the most unsuitable drudgery; and this, among other painful effects, had proved a temptation to her, to neglect in some measure her own duty and the care of her soul, and thus had tended in every way to mar her comeliness. It would have been very strange for king Solomon to introduce his favourite queen, speaking in this manner to her attendants. It has indeed been imagined, that Pharaoh's daughter, having early embraced the true religion, was persecuted for her religion by her brothers, and driven to the south of Egypt, where by keeping the vineyards she acquired a tawny colour, so that she neglected her own vineyard, that is, her beauty or her fortune: and that Solomon, hearing of her piety and sufferings, sent for her and married her. A lively invention may easily thus make history, or write novels: but the Scripture is silent. The whole is highly improbable. "Solomon made affinity "with Pharaoh, and took Pharaoh's daughter." (1 Kings iii. 1.) This looks more like a political transaction between Pharaoh and Solomon, than such a marriage of vehement and disinterested affection, as the supposition implies.

V. 7. The spouse next addresses herself to Christ, as one desirous of distinguishing betwixt his holy rest and consolations, and the false peace and confidence of hypocrites. She requests to be instructed in what places he was used to feed his flock, and to shelter them from the noon-day sun of persecution, or temptation, that she might seek the same holy refuge; and not be tempted, or even appear inclined, to join those companies who follow corrupt teachers and hold erroneous tenets; who indeed profess to be the companions or friends of Christ, but are rather his rivals, and set up an interest in opposition to him.—'Weary of wandering uncertainly after those who pretend 'to thy Spirit, but mislead such as are guided by them.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Whom thou hast called to the dignity of thy pastors, and they set forth their own dreams instead of thy doctrine.'

V. 8. It is evidently absurd to suppose this verse to be the language of the attendant virgins, or unestablished converts; who yet were able to instruct the spouse in her perplexity, and even to answer the requests she had addressed to her Beloved. No doubt this Bridegroom is here introduced, as counselling his faithful spouse with an encouraging commendation of her spiritual beauty, as compared with the rest of Adam's fallen race. If she were at a loss, and feared lest she should mistake some company of hypocrites, or heretics for his chosen children; she could not do better than to consider the examples of the most approved believers in the successive ages of the church, with the doctrines which they maintain: and to follow their steps; without regarding those who pretended to new discoveries, and taught opinions, either unknown in other ages, or condemned as heresy; and to mark such pastors as simply kept the beaten track, the good old way; to attend on their ministry, with her children, or young converts; and to instruct such as were put under her care according to their example. The literal meaning of this, as applied to Pharaoh's daughter, is not especially stated, by those who adhere to that mode of interpretation.

V. 9. Egypt was noted for beautiful and swift horses: those of Pharaoh's chariots would doubtless be the most excellent of the kind; and in their magnificent trappings would appear to the greatest advantage. This allusion therefore may mean, that in the judgment of Christ believers are the excellent of the earth; and that the harmony, which subsists among them, renders them peculiarly pleasant to him, and fitted to be the instruments of promoting his glory. The simile, as applied to a beautiful female, though an instance or two not wholly unlike it may be found in ancient writers, seems not very apposite.—The Septuagint renders the words for company of horses in 'the singular, my mare in Pharaoh's chariots;' and some think that this is the meaning of the original.

V. 10. The spiritual gifts and graces, which Christ bestows upon his church and every true believer, and which render their professed faith, and their conversation among men, ornamental and becoming, seem to be here described by the external ornaments then in use: and not without reference to the ornaments used in the harnesses of horses, especially in the royal chariots.

V. 11. This verse is generally supposed to be the reply of the attendant virgins, who thus engaged to prepare for the spouse the ornaments with which she was about to be decorated: but as the increase and perfection of the church's spiritual adorning is the gift and work of God; it may be doubted whether this is not to be considered in respect of the new creation, as in some respect similar to the remarkable words of the Creator, when about to form our first parents. (Note, Gen. i. 26.)

V. 12—14. The spouse here again speaks, "Whilst "the King sitteth at his table," (or meets his people in those ordinances in which they feast with him,) her spikenard, or precious ointment, sendeth forth its smell; that is, the grace received from his fulness springs forth into lively exercises of faith, love, gratitude, and adoration, which are pleasant and honourable to him. Yet Christ himself, and not his gifts, are most precious to her; and she resolves to lodge him near, or in her heart, as a bundle of myrrh or other fragrant gums are laid in the bosom, all the night, or during the darkness and troubles of life. For Christ was to her far more precious and delightful, than the most valued productions of the field, or vineyard.—'The most precious nard cometh from the spikes of a very 'small contemptible shrub; which may be considered as 'an emblem of the sweet odour of the Gospel, with which 'such mean and despicable persons, as the apostles were in 'themselves, filled the whole world.' (Bp. Patrick.) It is not certainly known what the word rendered camphire signifies: but it seems to have been some very costly perfume; and perfumes have always been immensely more in request in those eastern regions, than they are at present in this country. (Marg. Ref.) The original word, however, signifies also an atonement; and some Jewish writers have rendered the clause, 'the man who propitiates 'all things,' with apparent reference to the Messiah.

V. 15. Here Christ again speaks, commending his beloved, as fair; especially, as having eyes like the dove, which are gentle, loving, and pure. This may imply her spiritual discernment, watchfulness, the purity and simplicity of her affection for him, and her mild and harmless conduct in the world.

V. 16, 17. Here the spouse answers, professing her admiring love and gratitude to the Saviour, and her delight in her union with him. By their bed or carpet being green, may be meant the efficacy of his ordinances, to render believers flourishing in holiness, and to convert sinners: and the beams of cedar and rafters of fir, may mean the stability of the new covenant, and the incorruptible nature of those mansions, in which believers will dwell with their Beloved for ever. The eastern nations generally sleep on carpets, and recline at meals on couches covered with them.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The things which are most intimately connected with the person and love of the divine Saviour, have super-eminent excellency; for, communion with him in faith and love, is as the marrow of religion. They who have tasted that he is gracious, long for renewed pledges of his kindness; and the more they experience of his grace and joy, the more fervent will be their desires. This sweet experience of his grace, gradually weans them from other objects, and disposes them to renounce all for his sake and at his command. The pleasures which arise from the most exquisite gratifications of every sense, convey to the mind a very faint and inadequate idea of that delight with which the believer, in some favoured moments, contemplates the Redeemer's excellencies, and his love which "passeth knowledge." This renders the preaching of the Gospel, the written word, prayer, praise, meditation, and Christian conversation so agreeable to him: then the name of Christ becomes "as ointment poured forth;" and the more the subject is discussed, the more glorious and lovely he appears. These are "joys with which a stranger inter-"meddleth not;" but every holy creature in heaven and earth loves the incarnate Saviour, in proportion to his love of the Father, and of his righteous law and holy service: and the further we are removed from all inordinate love of created objects, the more precious will Christ be to our hearts. But the more clearly we discern his glory, the more deeply sensible shall we be of our inability to follow him in a suitable manner; and at the same time the more desirous of doing it; thus experiencing that "we cannot "do the things that we would," our prayers for the effectual drawings of his grace will become more fervent and frequent; and we shall not only desire to run after him ourselves, but to animate others to do the same. Every sweet season of near communion with Christ will endear him more to our souls, and increase our joy and gladness in his favour and worship: we shall recollect with regret the comforts that we do not at present possess, and long and wait for their renewal, even more than sensualists do for the return of their unsatisfying joys. Our honourable thoughts of Christ will ever be productive of lowly thoughts of ourselves, so that nothing will appear estimable or amiable in us, except as interested in his righteousness and partakers of his holiness: and these we shall deem more preferable comeliness, than all the external glory which surrounded king Solomon. It is indeed lamentable that so many things should be visibly defective in the church; as they harden some in prejudices, and are stumbling-blocks to others. "Yet it must needs be that offences come; "but wo be to them by whom they come." We should therefore endeavour so to explain these subjects, as to prevent the effects of undeniable blemishes; and caution inquirers not to look on us, to form their judgment of Christianity, but on the example, precepts, and truths of Jesus, where they may view it uncorrupted. All that supposed deformity of the church, however, which results from want of wealth, learning, or secular power, or from her afflicted and persecuted condition, is in fact her glory and beauty: nay, the Saviour himself hath no form or comeliness to the carnal mind, that it should desire him. But it seldom happens, that we are much tempted or persecuted, without in some measure deviating from our duty; and without intermeddling with disputes, or employments not properly belonging to us: thus Satan prevails with us to keep other men's vineyards, and to neglect our own. And how dreadful is it, when those that should be labourers in the Lord's vineyard, are so taken up with worldly employments, as to neglect the care of their own souls, as well as the souls of those committed to them! Indeed even such ministers, as are busy in their proper work, should be very watchful over themselves; or their own vineyard will perhaps be worse tended than those of their hearers.

V. 7—17.

If the Lord Jesus be indeed our Beloved, we shall be greatly afraid of being drawn aside and imposed upon; and have frequent occasions to beseech him, as the great and good Shepherd, to guide us into his fruitful pastures and pleasant resting-places: nay, we shall fear even seeming to belong to those false teachers who beguile unstable souls, and draw away disciples after them; who pretend to be the friends, but in truth are the rivals, of the Bridegroom. If we seek his direction, in order to follow it, he will express his approbation, and preserve us from delusion; he will guide us in the path, that is beaten with the footsteps of his flock in every age; and satisfy us that we are "fol-"lowers of them who, through faith and patience, inherit "the promises:" he will show such as humbly ask him, who are those pastors that he employs to feed his sheep and lambs: and he will teach them to attend on their instruction, and to bring their families to partake of it also, and to assist their weaker brethren in forming their judgment in these important matters. The more humble and diffident of ourselves we are, the better will the Lord approve of us: he delights in the graces which he confers, and applauds the good that he enables us to do: he will perfect his own good work where it is truly begun; and continually add to the spiritual adorning of those whom he is beautifying with salvation. Communion with Christ transforms us into his image; the lively exercise of spiritual affections has a fragrancy of the same kind with "the savour "of his good ointments poured forth." But he himself is every thing to flourishing Christians: they desire that Christ may dwell in their heart by faith and love, and prepare them for himself by renewing them fully to his own likeness. The increase of this disposition renders them more and more the objects of his delight; and he especially approves of the meekness, purity, and holy love, which they derive from the dove-like Spirit of God. Thus the sacred flame is fanned and fed; and the soul daily having fellowship with the Father and the Son, by the Spirit, grows in holiness, and enjoys a lively hope of an incorruptible, undefiled, and unfading inheritance in the blessed world above. O Lord, visit our souls more and more with this salvation!

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1, 2. It is most obvious to suppose that the Bridegroom here speaks, and declares his own preciousness and condescending love. The rose is considered as the chief of flowers; and it is probable that Sharon was eminent for roses of beautiful hue and peculiar fragrancy. Thus Christ, in his person, character, and mediation, combines every excellency in the highest degree; and is most delightsome and refreshing to the souls of his people.—The lily, which adorns the lowly valleys, is an apt emblem of his humiliation in assuming our nature, and his lowliness of heart; and also of his dwelling and communing with the poor of this world, and the poor in spirit, in this vale of sin and sorrow; and likewise of his spotless purity. His church too is "as the lily among the thorns." 'They that believe in Christ partake of his excellencies.' (Bp. Patrick.) They cannot resemble him in his majesty or mediatorial excellency; but they do, in a measure, as to his lowliness and purity. Yet in this world they are like a lily surrounded, and crowded, and wounded, by worthless thorns; an emblem of the character of the wicked, their injuries to believers, and of their fitness for the fire of destruction. Christ describes his church under the emblem of a beautiful woman whom he hath espoused, and she describes him as one of the Sons of men: and the rest of mankind are called "the daughters" and "the sons;" being indeed originally of the same family; but bearing a very different character, and having formed a contrary alliance.

V. 3. The Spouse here speaks. The apple-tree (or citron-tree, as some suppose,) is not so stately as the cedar or the fir-tree, but its fruit is peculiarly valuable. Christ appeared in exterior meanness, but that covered the most transcendent preciousness; and the fruits of his abasement and sufferings endear him to every believer, far above all the most admired characters in the world. A traveller scorched by the noon-day sun, would gladly shelter himself under the branches of a spreading apple-tree, and refresh himself with its fruit. Thus the believer remembers seasons, when remorse of conscience, and fear of deserved wrath, with the temptations of Satan, and the injuries of the world, have dismayed or distressed him, and left him without any conceivable refuge, except that revealed in Christ Jesus. To this he fled with earnest desires, and under it he sat down, or sheltered himself; while the pardon and peace that it afforded him were delightful to his heart; and the consolations of the Spirit of adoption, as fruits from this tree of life, were sweet to his taste, in proportion to his former terror, humiliation, and affliction, and to the degree in which he was weaned from earthly objects. Some explain this of the true God, as pre-eminent above all the idols of the heathen; and of the comforts of true religion: but it is only in Christ that the true God is the Refuge and Comforter of sinners; and the simile is vastly more apposite, if applied to the Lord Jesus, in whom the carnal eye sees "no form or comeliness," but faith discerns every thing glorious and precious.

V. 4. The image is here varied. Christ is the Author and Finisher of our faith, as well as the Ransom for our sins. He brings the soul to seek and enjoy those comforts that are communicated through his ordinances, which are as a banqueting house where his saints feast with him. (Marg. Ref.) The standard being erected and the banner displayed, the soldiers resort to it, and by keeping near it, perform their duty to their leader, and best consult their own safety. The love of Christ, manifested in his humiliation unto death, is the banner that he displays by his word. To this the believer resorts, and by it is directed and encouraged; and thus he obtains the benefits of salvation, is animated to resist every enemy, and finds effectual protection.

V. 5. The spouse, being overcome with love, cries out for refreshments and supports; for cordials, perfumes, or cooling fruits. "Stay me with those flagons, comfort "me with those apples," or citrons; namely, the flagons in the banqueting house, and the fruit of the tree before mentioned. The word rendered flagon is so translated, with evident propriety, wherever else it is used in Scripture. (2 Sam. vi. 19. 1 Chr. xvi. 3. Hos. iii. 1.) The love of believers for the unseen Saviour can never be satisfied by any thing short of the fruition of him in heaven: this renders the world an uneasy place to them; and when grace is in lively exercise, they become even faint and sick of this love; "desiring to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, "which is far better." But their hunger and thirst are stayed with foretastes of that felicity, in the fulfilment of the promises, that are as flagons full of rich wine, as apples from the tree of life: and nothing but these cordials and provisions can allay their spiritual appetite; for these therefore they most earnestly seek and pray. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6. 'This is a representation of the tenderest affec-'tion of a husband for his wife, when he sees her in dan-'ger to faint; and being applied to Christ and his Church, 'sets forth his readiness to succour us in all our needs, by 'the power of his Spirit.' (Bp. Patrick.) Christ, though absent as to sight and full fruition, is present to the faith of his people; and the spouse here thankfully acknowledges, that he graciously comforted her, when ready to faint with earnest longings after him, or under troubles and temptations.

V. 7. According to our translation, these are the words of the spouse, concerning her Beloved, who had fallen asleep, while employed in supporting and comforting her. In this sense, the verse implies, that she, afraid of terminating his gracious visit by any disturbance, charges the daughters of Jerusalem not to awake him. We grieve the Spirit of God by wrong tempers, and others may ruffle and discompose us by their unseasonable intervention. The comforts of communion with God are but short-lived on earth; but care is required not to terminate them prematurely: and every thing should be avoided, which molests devotion, or damps the exercise of faith and love. But many suppose that the verse is the language of Christ concerning the spouse: and the original, though capable of either sense, seems rather to favour this interpretation.—'Christ chargeth them, which have to do in the church, 'as it were by a solemn oath, that they trouble not the 'quietness of it.' The roes and hinds of the field are gentle and pleasant creatures, but exceedingly timorous; and so are introduced as witnesses to the charge here given; which is indeed a solemn adjuration, not by them, but as in their presence. (Gen. xxi. 30, 31.) Some render it, 'I adjure you, O ye daughters of Jerusalem, that ye re-'main with the roes and hinds of the field; lest ye should 'awake my love, &c.'

V. 8, 9. The spouse here again speaks. Her Beloved hath withdrawn; but with rapture she hears his voice, and perceives the tokens of his return, "leaping upon," or over, "the mountains, skipping upon the hills." This may apply to the ancient believers' expectation of the promised Saviour coming in the flesh: they heard his voice by the prophets, and every age gave fuller intimations of his approach. Though he seemed to delay, yet he was coming with speed and alacrity: nor could any obstructions prevent or retard his approach; but he would surmount them, as the hart does the mountains and hills. In this sense, the wall behind which he stood, the windows through which he looked, and the lattice through which he showed some glimpses of his glory, represent the types and ceremonies of the law, which concealed him from unbelievers; but through which his eyes were upon believers, and they became acquainted with him. It is equally applicable to his coming at death to receive the believer's soul to glory, and at judgment to complete our salvation: and in this sense, the same expressions represent our communion with him by faith, and through his word and ordinances; and the partial transient views which we have of his glory, compared with those of the saints in light. It may also be explained of his spiritual visits to his people, who are mourning for his absence, and for their sins which occasioned it; and in this sense, the latter verse means, that Christ is near to watch over his people, and to give them some tokens of his favour, when they have not the full joy of his salvation.

V. 10—13. This most poetical description of the approach of spring, in which the spouse speaks of Christ, as inviting her to walk abroad with him, may be variously applied. It may have some reference to the abrogation of 14 ¶ O [g] my dove, [h] that art in the clefts of the rock, in the secret places of the stairs, let me see thy countenance, let me hear thy voice; [i] for sweet is thy voice, and [m] thy countenance is comely.

15 Take us [n] the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines: for our vines have [o] tender grapes.

16 ¶ My [p] Beloved is mine, and I am his: [q] he feedeth among the lilies.

17 Until [r] the day break, and [s] the shadows flee away, turn, my [t] Beloved; and be thou like a roe, or a young hart upon the mountains of * Bether.

the more dark and discouraging dispensation of Moses, for that of Christ: but it seems also to mean the sinner's conversion. Christ invites the new convert, by the discoveries of his love, to arise from sloth and despondency; and to leave sin and worldly vanities, for the sake of his holy fellowship. The winter, that is now past, may either mean the years spent in ignorance and sin, unfruitful and uncomfortable; or the gloomy season, attended with storms and tempests, which followed his conviction of guilt and danger, and preceded his peace and joy in believing. "The flowers" may denote the opening blossoms of holy affections and desires; "the time of the singing of birds" may mean his first grateful songs of praise; "the voice of the turtle," then first heard in the land, may signify, the first comforts of the witnessing, sealing Spirit of God; "the green figs, and tender grapes," or buds, which are pleasant to the smell, represent the first immature fruits of righteousness, which promise a future valuable increase: and all these encouraging tokens and evidences of divine favour, are employed as motives to the soul, to follow Christ more entirely. The passage may also be accommodated to the believer's renewed comforts, after a season of temptation and discouragement; to the renewed peace of the church, after sore persecutions; and to the completion of happiness in heaven.

V. 14. Christ is still the speaker. The spouse, conscious of her unworthiness, and ashamed of her former sins and the imperfection of her present services, had hidden herself in the clefts of the rock, or in some retired place, as declining his gracious invitation. 'Thou that 'art ashamed of thy sins, come and show thyself unto 'me.' In this is represented a mixture of humility and unbelief common in the experience of true believers. But Christ speaks to her, as his dove, gentle, harmless, loving, and faithful, and entreats her to come forth: for he took great delight in her, as a true penitent; he deemed her countenance comely, and was well pleased to behold it; and her voice sweet, and delighted to hear it, when employed in confession, prayer, and grateful praise. Some, however, understand the verse, of the church (or believers,) fleeing from persecution into the most retired places, (as the dove flees into the recesses of the rock from the birds of prey,) yet there encouraged to present her worship, as assured of the tender affection and gracious acceptance of her Beloved, though despised and hated by the world.—The faithful and loving dove is an apt emblem of the true church, as espoused to Christ; and by her conformity to him through the sanctification of the Spirit, she is well pleasing in his sight.

V. 15. The new convert had before been represented as a vine with tender grapes: (13) and the foxes, it seems, used to injure the vines and destroy the grapes by trampling on them, as well as the wild boars by devouring them. 'I require all those, that act by authority from me,—'to use their early diligence to discover and confute the 'sophistry of deceivers, who craftily insinuate their false 'doctrines into weak and incautious souls, and thereby 'seduce those who are newly converted; and but infirm in 'the faith.' (Bp. Patrick.) False prophets are, by Ezekiel, compared to foxes; and in many particulars, false teachers and heretics resemble this artful creature. Yet the inroads they make on the church, and the destruction they occasion, seem too evident and formidable, to be described by young foxes: and those who consider the verse as exclusively a command of Christ to his servants, to oppose heretics, appear reduced to some difficulty to exclude the idea of persecution. Perhaps, in general, it is a caution against every thing, however plausible, which tends to hinder the prosperity of the church and the fruitfulness of believers, and against heresy in particular. Whatever wastes time, squanders money, or engrosses a large share of attention, and tends to the neglect of the means of grace, is of this kind: and when the pursuit, or study, (such as music, painting, and many other things of the same nature,) is not directly criminal in itself; it spoils the vine, and mars its tender grapes, with the unsuspected subtlety of the fox. The first rising of sinful thoughts and desires, and the beginnings of those trifling pursuits, are like the little foxes, which if not taken will spoil the vines. Trifling visits, which waste much time, incur great expense, put the mind out of frame for devotion; and intrude on the hours that should be employed in meditation, self-examination, searching the Scripture, and secret prayer, are peculiarly injurious in this respect: and no good can arise from such unnecessary intercourse with worldly people or with superficial professors, whose company is still more prejudicial. Specious deviations from the truth, which make a little allowance for the pride, avarice, vanity, or indolence of our hearts, and admit of some measure of conformity to the world; and the discourse of those who are ever asking, What harm is there in this, or in that? or What need of this or that measure of diligence? are little foxes, which spoil the vines; and which must be taken, and removed out of the way, by private Christians and public teachers, who desire to be, or to see their people, fruitful branches of the living Vine. Even lawful and needful pursuits and recreations, when attended with excess or inexpediency, "choke the word, and it becometh unfruitful;" "for our "vines have tender grapes." This caution, (whether of the Bridegroom, or the attendants,) must be allowed to come in very abruptly, if our attention be fixed on the external arrangement of a dramatical dialogue.

V. 16, 17. The Spouse here again speaks, as one assured that Christ and all his blessings, are become her's by faith; of which her love to him, and her unreserved surrender of herself to be his, devoted to his service, in body and soul, formed the sure evidence; and she rejoices, in experiencing that he takes pleasure in visiting and communing with his people, who resemble him in lowliness and purity, and in feeding them in the green pastures of his ordinances; and she begs, that he will continue to favour her with those visits, "till the day break, and the "shadows flee away." This may refer to the shadows of the Jewish dispensation, which were dispelled by the breaking of the Gospel-day, and the rising of the Sun of Righteousness; or to the darkness and shadows of our state on earth, which will shortly be changed for heavenly light and substantial felicity. The word Bether signifies division; and may intimate the removal of every thing, which now divides our souls from him, and from the beatific vision.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The most distinct and apparently opposite excellencies, centre in our divine Redeemer; and he appears as glorious in his deepest abasement and suffering for us, and in his condescending communion with us, as in his essential majesty and holiness. His people also are excellent, in proportion as they are conformed to him: and the small degree in which the meanest believer on earth resembles Christ, renders him more honourable and amiable than the most accomplished unbeliever; even as the lily is preferable to the prickly thorn. We should, however, remember among whom we dwell, expect to be injured by them, and endeavour to suffer with meekness. The believer, as his judgment matures, will admire the whole of the Redeemer's character: but he is commonly first attracted by perceiving the suitableness and preciousness of the fruits of his mediation. None of those eminent persons, whose characters and exploits are celebrated by historians, orators, and poets, can pretend to heal a wounded conscience or a broken heart; or to deliver a trembling sinner from the wrath of God and the power of Satan. They may be stately as the cedars of Lebanon; but the lowly Jesus, whose merits and grace bring relief in the hour of deep distress, is unspeakably more lovely in the eyes, and precious to the heart of the true Christian. Every time that he finds deliverance from guilt, fear, temptation, and distress, by faith in his name; and every experience of the sweetness of peace and joy in believing, and of the hope and comfort, which the Spirit of adoption communicates, increases his love to the Author of his eternal salvation. Let us then come, and sit down under his shadow, and abide there: we shall find great delight in so doing, and his fruit will be sweet to our taste: for none despise these joys, but they that never experienced them, and who have no desire after them, through their eager pursuit of the vanities of the world. The Lord Jesus hath purchased the feast, and his ordinances are appointed that we may in them partake of it; and the same love which allures and protects us in communing with him, animates us to venture and suffer for his sake: and with that banner before our eyes, or over our heads, we shall valiantly encounter and surely overcome all our enemies. In proportion as we relish heavenly consolations, our longings after them will increase; and earth would become intolerable to us, were we not stayed with those cordials and first-fruits of glory, until our course be finished. These we should earnestly seek for ourselves and for each other, that we may not faint through the troubles of our way. Even when our consolations do not abound, we have cause to acknowledge, that we have many gracious supports and unmerited mercies from the Lord's presence with us. Nor should we expect uninterrupted comfort on earth; for the Lord will, when he pleases, leave us to feel how miserable and helpless we should be without him: but it becomes us to be careful not to bring this trial on ourselves by sins and negligences, or to occasion it to others: for, as a small noise will drive away the timorous hart; so, a little misconduct will grieve the Spirit of God, and interrupt our spiritual consolations. We may therefore rather wonder, that we have so many precious pledges of divine love, than that we so often mourn and are disconsolate, when we reflect on our own want of watchfulness and circumspection.

V. 8—17.

If the Christian so longs for the Lord's manifested presence and love, and receives every intimation of it with such exultation; and if ancient believers so rejoiced in the prospect of his appearance on earth in our nature: how should we anticipate the complete salvation which will come to our souls at the hour of death, and to our bodies also at the glorious resurrection! For these purposes our Redeemer will come quickly, and we shall soon be with him, and "see him as he is, and be like him," and share his glory. In the mean time our mortal flesh, as a wall, intercepts our view of him: but his eye is upon us; and every glimpse we have of him by faith is intended to render us willing "to be absent from the body, that we may "be present with the Lord." If we have experienced the blessed change which takes place in conversion; if we have obeyed the call of Christ, to arise and follow him, and to leave the world and sin behind, that we may enjoy his love; if we have thus found peace of conscience, and joy in the Holy Ghost; and if the blossoms and fruits, (though but tender and green,) of true holiness, appear in our lives: we need not fear to follow him through any trials and temptations; nor have we any cause to dread his last call by death, to arise, and come away to the full fruition of his love. Even the unripe fruits of holiness are pleasant unto him, whose grace hath produced them; and when we are humble and ashamed of our services, he will approve and commend them. But we should not allow unbelief to tarnish our self-abasement: our Lord accounts that countenance comely which is furrowed with tears of godly sorrow, and those prayers sweet which are the language of a broken heart: and the contrite and penitent are always welcome guests at his table and supplicants at his throne of grace, and should not decline his gracious invitations. Whilst we live here, our desire should be to bring forth plenteously the fruits of righteousness: and careful observers will perceive that the little despised foxes do more harm to the branches of the living vine, than the dreaded wild boars. Plausible errors, trivial omissions, compliances, and indulgences, are more general hinderances to our progress and usefulness, than gross transgressions, or distressing temptations: and Satan and his emissaries do us more harm, as subtle unsuspected deceivers, than as furious persecutors. We should then watch against the first occasions and feeble beginnings of evil, and suppress the first risings of sinful inclinations; destroying the little foxes before they become capable of important mischief. This circumspect conduct conduces greatly to our full assurance of hope: and when it becomes evident that we love Christ, and are his willing people, we shall be sure that he is our loving Saviour. He will also delight in us, as the lilies that he hath planted; and we shall be solaced with his gracious visits, and wait in humble patient hope, till these earthly shadows flee away, and he come swiftly over every separating mountain to take us home unto himself.

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—5. The circumstances of this narration, (and of one in some respects similar in the fifth chapter,) are so improbable, if applied in the literal meaning, to the newly espoused queen of king Solomon, that, to evade the difficulty, and to maintain the consistency of a dramatic poem on occasion of Solomon's marriage, it has been considered merely as a dream of the spouse. But the narrative gives no intimation of this; so that the supposition only cuts the knot, which it was not found easy to loose. Some interpreters suppose, that the spouse seeking her Beloved, "by night on her bed," denotes a season of darkness and drowsiness, of dim apprehensions, languid affections, and heartless services. Others accommodate it to a season of affliction. 'The church, by night, that is, [s] in troubles, seeketh to Christ, but is not immediately [t] heard.' But perhaps solitude and retired meditation are principally intended; as David "remembered God on his "bed, and meditated on him in the night-watches," which showed the fervency of his love. Yet the circumstance of the spouse not finding her Beloved, till she sought him in another manner, gives some ground to the opinion, that a degree of slackness and self-indulgence was intended. Being, however, uneasy at her ill success, she was excited to more decided endeavours to recover the comforts of communion with him. "The streets and broad ways of "the city," seem rather to imply earnestness in all the means of grace, in which the Lord is to be sought; than to mark the distinction between public, social, and private duties. Thus she is represented as seeking her Beloved in every part of the city. But still she did not succeed for a time: for she was further to be humbled, proved, and quickened. She therefore next applied to the watchmen that went about the city, who in this place denote the prophets and faithful ministers who could give proper directions to distressed souls, and earnest inquirers after the Saviour. But upon opening her case to them, and inquiring whether they had seen, and could direct her to her Beloved, she did not receive any immediate satisfaction. This may intimate, that we must not rest in any means, but by faith apply immediately to Christ, if we would succeed with him. At length, however, perhaps through their direction and counsel, she found her Beloved, and then she "held him, "and would not let him go," being afraid of losing the comfort of his presence; "until she had brought him into "her mother's house, &c." The church at large may be called the Mother of believers; the public ordinances are the chambers, in which they are conceived and born of God: and the Spouse, bringing her Beloved into this house and these chambers, may signify the believer's open profession of his faith, and joining himself to the Lord and his people; with a declaration, expressed or implied, of his intention to walk with them in love and holy obedience. This was done of old, by those who were born Jews and circumcised in infancy, in a constant attention to all their sacrifices and sacred solemnities: and the Lord's Supper especially answers this purpose to Christians. The Spouse being now happy in communion with Christ, renews the charge before given to the daughters of Jerusalem; or Christ renews it respecting the church: for expositors are not agreed on this point. (Note, ii. 7.)

Jerusalem, expressing their admiration at the zeal and fervent love of the Spouse. They inquire "Who this is, "that cometh out of the wilderness;" perhaps alluding to the wilderness through which Israel passed, and from which they went up to possess the promised land. But a wilderness is a known emblem of this vain world: the believer comes out of it, when he renounces its friendship, and is delivered from the love of it; and when he leaves its sinful pleasures and pursuits, and refuses compliance with its customs and fashions, that he may seek happiness in communion with God through Jesus Christ. "Pillars "of smoke" ascended towards heaven, whilst the sacrifices were consumed on the altar of burnt-offering; and sweet gums and spices of the merchant were burnt upon the golden altar of incense. This may represent the lively affections, and fervent prayers and praises, and other spiritual sacrifices of believers, ascending to heaven before God, through the atonement and intercession of Christ.—The last clause may be rendered, "more precious, than all "the powders of the merchant."

V. 7, 8. The Spouse seems to call on her companions, not to admire her feeble graces and imperfect services, but to Behold her Beloved. As the bed and bedchamber of Solomon were guarded by a number of well armed soldiers, lest he should be disturbed or assaulted in the night: so a guard of angels continually protects the church from the assaults and terrors of her enemies, in the darkest hours, whilst she maintains communion with her Beloved; yea, the Lord himself is her Keeper by day and night. 'Behold the love which the great King hath to her, having 'prepared all things for her reception into society with 'himself; of whose royal person and happiness, Solomon 'himself, in all his glory, is but a figure. Valiant persons 'encompass him night and day; but not comparable to 'the power and multitude of that heavenly host, which 'secure the church in her enjoyments, and take care of her 'safety.' (Bp. Patrick.) This supposes the verse to be a continuation of the admiring language used by the daughters of Jerusalem, concerning the zeal and happiness of the spouse.

V. 9, 10. Here again Solomon is the type of Christ, the King of Israel, and our Prince of Peace. The chariot of cedar, or open carriage, which Solomon had made for himself, may mean the Gospel of Christ; or the everlasting covenant, which he hath mediated in our behalf, in which his glory and our felicity are united: the silver pillars, may denote the precious promises and engagements, which are the support and ornament of this covenant, and the security of all believers: the bottom of gold, and the covering of purple, may mean the rich blessings and royal privileges conferred on every believer: and the midst thereof, paved with love, shows that all these blessings spring from the love of God in Christ Jesus to fallen sinners, "according "to the eternal purpose which he hath purposed in him-"self;" and centre in it. The clause rendered "for "the daughters of Jerusalem," may mean "by or from "the daughters of Jerusalem." Solomon's carriage was adorned by their needle-work, and the figures, whatever they were, wrought by them, no unapt emblem of Christians "adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour in "all things."

V. 11. This verse contains the most express allusion to the marriage of Solomon of any in the whole book; but whether to Naamah the Ammonitess, his first wife as far as we know, or to Pharaoh's daughter, or to some other of his wives, is not said. It seems that it was customary in ancient times for the bridegroom, or bride, or both, to wear a nuptial crown: and it may be supposed that Solomon's, on such a joyful occasion, would be very magnificent; and it was put on his head by Bathsheba.—'O ye daughters of Zion, look upon king Solomon, as 'he sits solemnly crowned in the day of his greatest roy-'alty and triumph; and compare his highest pomp with 'the divine magnificence of my Saviour in that day when 'his blessed marriage shall be fully perfected above, to the 'eternal rejoicing of himself and his church; and see 'whether there be any proportion between them.' (Bp. Hall.) When the sinner finds "peace and joy in believ-"ing," and makes an open profession of his faith and love; especially when large multitudes thus join themselves to the Lord, (as was the case on the day of Pentecost;) the happy season may be called the day of the heavenly Bridegroom's espousals, and the day of the gladness of his heart: for espousals are not a secret transaction: but the recognition, before proper witnesses, or publicly, of the mutual consent of the two contracting parties to be united in marriage. The church is the mother of Christ, as to his human nature, that is, he was born within the church; and she crowns him, when through her ordinances believers are thus espoused to him. Then his power and grace are displayed; he sees of the travail of his soul and the purchase of his blood; and these are the trophies and monuments of his glorious victories over the world, sin, Satan, and death. Angels in heaven rejoice over one penitent sinner; saints on earth rejoice and celebrate the Redeemer's praises, when this event is made known to them: he himself rejoices over the redeemed sinner, as in the day of the gladness of his heart: and the daughters of Zion, (every one who is disposed to seek this salvation,) should go forth to behold these things; that they may be encouraged in believing, and in making profession of their faith, by observing how glorious our King appears in saving sinners.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our remaining sinfulness, the snares of Satan, and the fascinations of the world, may lull even true believers into comparative negligence: yet if indeed Christ be our Beloved, we shall not utterly intermit our search of him. But if our affections become cold, and our attendance on ordinances remiss and unfrequent, it is salutary for us to lose our assurance, and to be distressed with fears and doubts. This gentle rebuke of our folly and ingratitude, which merit severer punishment, is intended to excite us to seek him more earnestly: nor can a true believer deliberately rest in any thing short of the enjoyment of the love of Christ. When we are stirred up to use diligence, in attending on divine ordinances; if we do not immediately succeed, the delay should not discourage but humble us; and lead us to closer self-examination, and more frequent and earnest prayer: nor can either new converts or returning backsliders expect to find peace and comfort in any other way. They who are troubled in mind, should open their case to the watchmen of the holy city, and desire their assistance in seeking Christ and the joy of his salvation: but such as are not experimentally acquainted with him themselves, cannot point him out to others. We should use, but not depend on, instruments and means: and though the Lord will prove our faith and love; yet he will be found of all who seek him with humble and persevering diligence; and days, weeks, months, or even years of sorrowful waiting, will soon be compensated by the joy of having found him whom our souls love. And not only will that joy be proportioned to our desire after his favour, and our regret for having forfeited the comfort of it: but our future watchfulness will be increased in the same measure. We should inform all, who fear God, what He hath done for our souls; that they may praise him on our account, and be encouraged by our example: and we should aim by every means to bring others to partake of our privileges and comforts. Our faith ought to be declared by an open confession; and when we find our hearts enlarged in joy and gratitude, we should not delay joining ourselves to the Lord and his people, at his table: that we may have the benefit of Christian communion, and of the prayers and counsels of our brethren. And we should still call upon ourselves and each other, to beware of grieving our holy Comforter, and provoking the departure of our Beloved. Lively Christians leaving the world and sin behind them, and setting their affections on things above; offering the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, with fervent love, joy, and gratitude, through the influence of the Holy Spirit; and presenting every service through the mediation of Christ, are a lovely and edifying sight. Such persons adorn the Gospel, and often convince less earnest professors that there is an excellency and happiness in religion, which cannot be attained without great diligence. But the believer will never think highly of himself; and will always direct those who notice him to look unto Jesus and his glory and grace: and the more we rejoice in his unsearchable riches, the greater earnestness shall we express in recommending them to others. In this respect our love is without selfishness; as we know that here is sufficient to enrich and felicitate all who come. The protection and security, arising from armed and valiant guards, are a feeble shadow of the peace and safety of those who trust in the Lord: and if our minds were always stayed upon him, and communing with him, we should not fear in the darkest night of temptation, or even in the gloomy hour of death. Blessed be God for the everlasting Gospel of our King of righteousness and peace; for the precious promises and inviolable security of the new covenant; for the rich and royal privileges to which believers are now admitted, and taught hereafter to expect; and especially for that unfathomable love from which they proceed. May that "love constrain us to live to Him who died for "us and rose again," and "to love one another with a "pure heart fervently." And blessed be God that, whilst believers may know that he hath loved them with an everlasting love, and will never leave them nor forsake them: sinners are assured, that "every one that seeketh find-"eth." No affectionate bridegroom so rejoices over his bride on the day of his espousals, as the Lord Jesus rejoices over the poor sinner who comes to trust in his mercy and salvation. Nor did ever Solomon appear so glorious, when arrayed in royal majesty, with a crown of pure gold upon his head, as our Redeemer doth, when converted sinners acknowledge their obligations to him, and join themselves unto his people. This is the crown which he most values! Poor dejected, trembling sinner, go forth, and behold him, how he is glorified, and how he rejoices in saving the meanest and the vilest; and be encouraged to hope, that he will be glorious in saving thee also.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1—5. By the spouse, as here addressed, by her Beloved, with most tender affection and high commendations, we may understand either individual believers, or the church collectively; and the induction of several particulars, may show in general, that the church and the believer partake of every kind of spiritual excellency; though we may not be able satisfactorily to apply the several allusions. The "dove's eyes within her locks," may denote the modesty with which believers conceal their good works, which spring from holy and gentle love: or the chaste eyes shaded by locks of hair, may mean an indisposition to gaze abroad, and an unwillingness to be gazed on. The "hair like a flock of goats, &c." which are noted for their orderly following the he-goat, may signify the believer's intelligent profession of faith, and his regular conversation, the result of sound knowledge and judgment. "The teeth," which prepare the food for digestion, being compared to a flock of ewes, newly washed, or after they are shorn, each accompanied by two lambs, may denote the believer's teachable disposition, his regular attendance on instruction, and its beneficial effect upon his conduct, rendering him very fruitful in good works. But some apply this to the ministers, who prepare the spiritual food for the nourishment of the church; and to the harmony and purity of their doctrines, and its efficacy in the conversion of sinners, and the sanctification of believers. "The lips like a "thread of scarlet, and the pleasant voice," evidently mean the profitable improvement of the gift of speech, in edifying conversation, in preaching the Gospel, and in worshipping God: "The temples, like a piece of a pomegranate, "within the locks," may be interpreted of humiliation before God for defects and sins that he alone seeth, or, of the modesty, as well as prudence, with which ministers should attend their work; or of those excellencies in the church and the believer, which Jesus Christ peculiarly approves, but which are concealed from the view of the world. "The neck," which unites the head and the body, is commonly explained to mean faith, which uniteth unto Christ our Head, and is a shield to ward off, and quench the fiery darts of the wicked one; and which puts the soul under the Lord's protection, as in a well fortified and defended tower: "The two breasts like two young roes," &c. if we accommodate them to the believer, may denote simplicity of affection for Christ, and the delight, which Christ reciprocally takes in him; as the husband in the affections of the wife of his bosom: or the connexion that there is in the distinct exercises of spiritual graces, which are as twins; and the idea of young roes, which feed among the lilies, may denote conformity to Christ, who is thus described, (ii. 16.) The believer delights in communion with Christ and his people, as he delights in them. But the two breasts, applied to the body of the church, may also denote the two Testaments, those breasts of consolation which are pleasant as the young roes, and twins in doctrine; whence ministers deduce all their instructions; whence converts, as new-born babes, draw the sincere milk of the word and grow thereby: and established Christians not only deduce continual improvement, but learn those things which they usefully communicate to others: As some of these expressions do not seem aptly descriptive of feminine beauty, I take it for granted, that they have a spiritual meaning, though far from being confident that the exact import of each allusion is pointed out. But these seem the more probable conjectures that have been formed on the subject.

V. 6. "The mountain of myrrh and the hill of "frankincense," may mean the mountain on which the temple was built, and where the incense was burnt, and where the people at the same time worshipped the Lord. This was his peculiar residence, till the shadows of the legal dispensation were dispersed, by the breaking of the Gospel-day, and the rising of the Sun of Righteousness: and thither believers resorted to meet him in his ordinances. At present he dwelleth in human nature, and is gone into the true holy place, to present the worship of his people before the throne with the incense of his intercession; and though Christ in respect of his human nature is absent from his church on earth, and will continue to be so, till the heavenly day break, and these earthly shadows flee away; yet in heaven he is maintaining our cause, and he is spiritually present in his ordinances, and with his people; as he said, when he ascended, "Lo, I am with you al-"ways, even unto the end of the world. Amen."

V. 7. 'Thou art exceeding beautiful, O my church, 'in all parts of thee: for all thy sins are done away, and 'thine iniquity is covered; and lo, I present thee to my 'Father, without spot, or wrinkle, or any such defor-'mity.' (Bp. Hall.) The apostle, however, in the passage alluded to, (Eph. v. 27.) evidently intended the perfect sanctification of the church, when admitted into the heavenly state, which is the completion of her sacred union with her Beloved.

V. 8. 'Christ promiseth his church, to call his faith-'ful from all corners of the world.' 'Here now begins 'a new representation; as appears by this, that the style 'wherein the Bridegroom speaks is altered; she who 'hitherto had been called his love or friend, being now 'called his spouse, and never before, though very frequently in the following part of the song.' 'We may look upon 'this as a description of the church, coming out of a state 'of persecution, and receiving greater testimonies of her 'Saviour's love than ever. For, coming from the tops of 'high mountains, where there were lions' dens, and where 'leopards inhabited, cannot well signify any thing else 'than coming from places where they were in danger to be 'devoured by persecutors. Shenir and Hermon were 'parts of the same mountain; so Amana was a part of 'Libanus: and though the lower parts of this mountain 'were very pleasant; yet the top of it was horrid, 'and inhabited by wild beasts.' (Bp. Patrick.) The original is future, not imperative; and implies not merely an invitation, but also a promise, that the true church shall be brought out of every scene of danger and suffering to the enjoyment of consummate felicity in the presence and full favour of her Beloved. In what sense could Pharaoh's daughter be called to come to Solomon, after their espousals, from the horrid tops of these mountains? And what had she, even before her marriage, to do, either on the savage wilds of Lebanon, the northern boundary of Canaan; or on the top of Hermon, to the east of Jordan? Egypt lies south-west of Canaan.

V. 9. Christ here expresses the vehemency of his love to his church. He calls her his sister, as well as his spouse: he bears our nature as the Son of man, and he makes us partakers of the divine nature as the children of God. His spouse had "ravished," or taken away "his "heart, with one of her eyes:" that is, by looking to him, in the simplicity of faith and love; and, "with one chain "of her neck," or by every exercise of those harmonious graces, and practice of those holy duties, which are the ornament of the believer and of his profession.

V. 10. The believer's holy love to Christ and to his people, is highly esteemed by him: he greatly delights in it, as the fruit of his own Spirit, and the reflection of his own image. As believers prefer the love of Christ to all earthly joys: so Christ prefers their love and grace to all the sacrifices and incense of the temple, to the choicest productions of the whole earth, and to the most admired characters which have inhabited it.

V. 11. The prayers, praises, thanksgivings, profession, and pious conversation of believers, are pleasant to the gracious Redeemer, as the pure honey that droppeth from the honey-comb: every expression is to him, as if honey and milk were under their tongue, whilst they speak from the abundance of their hearts; and their whole conduct, whilst they rely on his merits and copy his example, is fragrant unto him above the most delightful spots on earth.

V. 12—14. The world is a wilderness: but the Church is a garden enclosed by divine grace, and stored with every valuable plant, which is well cultured and thriving. It has within itself a spring, or fountain, whence every part of it is abundantly watered; i. e. the fertilizing influences of the Holy Spirit. But this spring is shut up, this fountain is sealed. The world knoweth not these wells of salvation: nor can any opposer stop up, or corrupt this fountain, or prevent the course of its healing streams. The effects men may perceive, the cause they cannot discover: for the believer's "life is hid with Christ in God." Some by the plants suppose young converts to be intended, and by the enclosing of the garden and spring, the exclusion of the wicked from the sacred ordinances of the Church.

V. 15. These words seem to be spoken by the spouse, rendering to Christ the praise of all the good which he had commended in her. He is the Fountain, which makes these gardens fruitful; even a Well of living waters, from whom all heavenly graces flow, (as streams from the declivities of Lebanon,) to water every part of his church.—'The church confesseth that all her glory and beauty 'cometh of Christ, who is the true Fountain of all grace.' —Many, however, suppose the verse to be a continuation of the preceding commendation; and to imply, that the church is not only pure and pleasant in herself, but so abundantly replenished with gifts and graces, as to be capable of communicating blessings to all around; (Notes, John iv. 10—14. vii. 37—39.)

V. 16. The spouse considering herself as a garden, well watered, planted, and tended, earnestly desires that her graces may be more lively, her spices more fragrant, and her fruits more rich and abundant: and she calls upon the wind, (another emblem of the Holy Spirit in his diversified operations,) to blow upon her garden for this purpose. The north wind is commonly interpreted to mean the convincing and humbling effects of the Spirit, which are sharp and unpleasant, but very useful: the south wind is supposed to denote his enlivening and comforting influences, which cause hope, love, gratitude, and zeal to abound in the heart. This she calls for, that her services might be more pleasant and honourable to her Beloved, and ensure to her his constant presence. (Note, v. 1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The church of Christ, and every true believer, are not only greatly beloved by him, and regarded with a condescension which cannot be expressed or conceived: but they really possess great excellency and spiritual beauty derived from his grace, and forming the reflection of his holiness. The illuminated understanding, the spiritual judgment, the submissive will, the holy affections of love and gratitude, the regulated passions, the bold profession, the blameless conversation, and the unostentatious usefulness of real Christians are very valuable. Their daily exercise of repentance, with genuine sorrow and self-abasement before God, on account of such failures and defects as others think nothing of, and with which He alone is acquainted; their continued dependence on the blood of Christ, and on the promised assistance of the Holy Spirit; their constant opposition to sin; their delight in the word and ordinances of God, and in speaking of his love and grace; and their habitual endeavour to lead others to an acquaintance with their beloved Saviour: these, and other parts of the Christian temper, are very good in themselves, and pleasing to the Lord: and he would have them know how much he approves of them, that they may be encouraged amidst difficulties and temptations, and excited to greater watchfulness, diligence, and gratitude. He would also have the distinction strongly marked betwixt real and pretended disciples; and the mistake of those, who imagine that the doctrine of his free salvation tends to laxity in morals, effectually confuted. And when the whole church is considered, and contrasted with the rest of mankind; when the regular administration of divine ordinances, and profession of the sacred truths of God's word; the diligence, faithfulness, holy lives, patient sufferings, and usefulness of true ministers; their continual instruction of the people from the sacred Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, in every thing relating to doctrine and practice; the spiritual worship of numerous individuals and assembled congregations, throughout the earth, all ascending before the throne of God, through his intercession, who is gone before to be our Advocate: I say, when these things are candidly considered, we shall perceive the propriety of the expression, "Thou art all fair, my love, there is no spot "in thee." But we must by no means think, that mere professors of any description form a part of this chosen generation, this peculiar people. The church of which we speak, consists of those persons, who are "washed "and sanctified, and justified, in the name of the Lord "Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God:" in whom there is "no spot;" no sin unrepented of, unpardoned, or unsubdued: no part which is not beautified with salvation, in a measure which continually tends to perfection.

V. 8—16.

The Redeemer calls us to forsake earthly objects, and to set our affections on things above, whither he is gone before, and where he sitteth on the right hand of God. For every scene here below is full of trouble and danger: Satan and his emissaries go about as lions and leopards seeking whom they may devour: and a proper sense of our situation will not only lead us to a willingness to count all but loss, that we may win Christ; but will reconcile us to his call to depart hence, that we may go to be with him in heaven, where there are neither sins nor temptations. All our salvation springs from the Lord's special compassionate love to us as sinners: but he beholds with complacency and delight our faith and love, and endeavours to walk in his ordinances and commandments: he glories in his relation to us as our Brother and most endeared Friend: and surely we shall never be ashamed of it! And if he speak in such encouraging terms of our scanty measure of fruitfulness, how should we admire and extol his excellencies, and the savour of his sweet ointments, in his righteousness, his mediation, and his sacred word! As Christians, we are his garden, which he hath enclosed from the wilderness of fallen man, and stored with precious plants from the paradise above; and which he waters from the Fountain of life, that "springeth forth from the throne of God, and of the "Lamb;" that we should be filled with all "the fruits of "righteousness, which are through Jesus Christ to his "praise and glory." This garden is indeed enclosed, this fountain is shut up and sealed; so that the world can neither become acquainted with their value, nor do them any injury, but though ungodly men cannot understand our principles, nor comprehend the way in which our hearts are directed, influenced, and renewed from above; they can form a judgment of our conduct: and we should endeavour to convince them, that the holiness of our lives is as much superior to the general practice of the world, as we profess to maintain nearer communion with, and to receive other communications from the Lord, than they do. We should keep separate from them as a garden enclosed, and avoid conformity to them: and whilst we render all the glory to Him, who alone hath made us to differ; we should earnestly pray that this difference may be every day rendered more evident and decided. These commendations of true believers may well humble each of us in a consciousness how little we are entitled to them; and stir us up to be more fervent in seeking for the convincing and sanctifying

Nor should we confine our prayers to our own cases and wants: but pray without ceasing, that the same Spirit of life, holiness, and comfort may breathe on all the assemblies of the saints, and render their worship more spiritual, their love and joy more lively, and their fruits of righteousness more abundant, to the Redeemer's praise, and the honour and spread of his Gospel in the world.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. This verse, which belongs to the former chapter, is the gracious answer of Christ to the petition of the spouse. He had so prepared his garden that he could come into it with delight. The worship presented in his church was pleasant to him, as fragrant gums and spices. He relished the spiritual services of believers, as honey and the honey-comb. He also drank the wine and the milk; the most minute as well as the more costly oblations being acceptable to him, if it come from an upright heart. He then added an invitation to his friends and beloved people, to eat and drink abundantly. The ordinances in which they honour him, are means of communicating grace to them. The good works, which they perform to adorn his Gospel, evidence the reality of their grace, and make way for their consolation: it is his will, that they should rejoice in the provisions of his grace, whilst they live to his glory: they that would entertain Christ, must also entertain his poor disciples: and though their goodness cannot profit him, it may be useful to his beloved people; as a man who has an orchard or garden, which he delights to see stored with every valuable production, and yet he does not use them himself, but disperses them among his friends. The word rendered drink abundantly, signifies, be inebriated. "Be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, but "be filled with the Spirit." Some think that the martyrs, who laid down their lives from love to Christ, are meant by "the myrrh and spice," as peculiarly pleasing and honourable to him: and that the joy of angels and saints in heaven over the conversion of sinners on earth, is intended by the concluding invitation, "Rejoice with me; "for I have found my sheep that was lost." (Notes, Luke xv. 1. Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. A new scene here opens; and the spouse relates her conduct on a particular occasion, when she evidently acted improperly and was rebuked for it. 'To cover over 'all the improprieties of a literal interpretation concerning Solomon and Pharaoh's daughter, immediately after their espousals; the whole has been confidently stated to have been a dream; because it is said, "I sleep, but my "heart waketh." This expression, however, admits of a very different and instructive interpretation, if the spiritual meaning of the allegory be attended to: and there is no other intimation that it was a dream, or reason why it should be considered as such, except to keep up the imaginary consistency of a dramatic poem on the marriage of Solomon with Pharaoh's daughter, which has little or no foundation in Scripture, and cannot be clearly made out by internal evidence. (Note, i. 2.) Waiving therefore the consideration of the passage, in respect of these external circumstances: we here learn that the spouse, subsequent to the commendations which had been bestowed on her, fell into a drowsy and heartless frame of mind. "I sleep, "but my heart waketh." She is very dull, yet not utterly inattentive to her spiritual concerns. Her judgment and choice are the same, but her affections are cold, and her services formal: a case which often occurs in the believer's experience. (Matt. xxv. 5.) 'I take it to be a 'description of the dulness which is apt to creep upon the 'most excellent minds.' (Bp. Patrick.) In this situation she recognizes the voice of her Beloved, and hears him knock and request admission. This represents the warnings, reproofs, and invitations to a Christian, when in this drowsy frame; the convictions excited by the Holy Spirit; and the ineffectual desires felt, and the half purposes formed, on such occasions. He perceives that he is faulty and ought to be more earnest; he is gently admonished of his folly and ingratitude; and yet he yields to inactivity, despondency, or lukewarmness. (Rev. iii. 20.) The words of Christ, as here stated, are replete with tender affection, and introduced by the most endearing compellations, without the least anger or reproach: yet he complains, that "his head is filled with dew, and his locks "with the drops of the night;" implying the hardships and sufferings that he had endured in coming for the salvation of his people; and that it is very unkind, if they are not ready to admit and entertain him. As if a tender husband, having gone a long and wearisome journey, solely for the benefit of his wife; and having travelled very late in the night through the cold or rain, out of love to her company, should at length be shut out of doors, and obliged to continue all night in the street! The night-dew in those countries is very great.

V. 3. The vain excuses urged by the spouse, denotes the unprepared state of the believer's heart, when he has remitted his watch, grown negligent of his work, fond of ease and indulgence, and averse to exertion or inconvenience. In such a frame every thing forms a mighty difficulty; and delays and omissions of duty are admitted on the most frivolous pretences. Backwardness to show our love to Christ, by self-denying and expensive kindness to his afflicted and suffering people, may also be intended. 'Let 'us learn from hence what mischief sloth and laziness do, 'and in what troubles and pains they engage us. For the 'spouse here excusing herself, and not being willing pre-'sently to rise to the Bridegroom, is compelled a little while 'after, not only to rise and to run to the door, but to run 'through the city, and wander about the streets, and fall 'among the watchmen, and by them to be wounded; and 'after all she could scarcely find her Beloved; to whom 'if she had presently hearkened, and obeyed his heavenly 'call, she had avoided all these inconveniences.' (Theodoret in Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. This verse leads us to imagine some private aperture in the door, through which the person without, (being acquainted with it) might put in his hand and unbolt it; or, as some think, make signs of his displeasure. This may represent the effectual influence of the Spirit of Christ upon the heart, exciting sharp convictions and vigorous exercises of faith and grace. This divine influence caused her "bowels to be moved for him;" that is, it excited fervent desires after Christ and communion with him, attended with poignant sorrow and shame for having before behaved so ungratefully towards him.

V. 5, 6. The spouse rising up to open to her Beloved, represents the believer's renewed exercise of repentance and faith; by which he rises from his drowsiness and self-indulgence, applying by fervent prayer for the consolations of his love, and diligently removing every hinderance to communion with Christ. These actings of the soul are represented by "the hands and fingers dropping with "sweet-smelling myrrh upon the handles of the lock;" as being in themselves gracious, suited to the circumstances, and acceptable to the Lord; (2 Cor. vii. 9—11.) But notwithstanding this, "her Beloved had withdrawn himself, and was gone:" for the comforts of communion with God are easily forfeited, but not so readily recovered. —"Her soul failed her when he spake:" either she now recollected his former most tender and affectionate calls which she had resisted; or he spake a reproving word as he withdrew, which filled her with extreme distress. She, however, set herself, without more delay and with all earnestness, to seek him: but she "could not find him: "she called him, but he gave her no answer." That is, the believer in this case must expect to use every means of grace with the utmost diligence, without experiencing that comfort in them that he formerly did; until he be sufficiently rebuked and humbled for his offence. (Note, iii. 1—3.)

V. 7. The watchmen and keepers of the walls, in this place, seem to represent those nominal ministers, who may indeed guard the outworks of religion, but are destitute of the experimental knowledge of its power. Such persons generally treat those with harshness and contempt, who speak of their inward distresses and conflicts; and call them hypocrites, enthusiasts, or even lunatics. The most violent persecutions have in every age been excited by persons of this description, who, under pretence of guarding the walls of Zion, have treated the most spiritual believers as the vilest of the human species: and have accompanied other injuries by the trial of cruel mockings and reproaches: "Smiting, and wounding them, and taking away their "veil," that they might be considered as infamous and shameless. It may, however, also intimate that pious ministers are apt sometimes to mistake the case of tempted and distressed souls: and to treat them with harshness as hypocrites, instead of the tenderness which their case requires.

V. 8. This charge of the spouse to the daughters of Jerusalem seems to mean the distressed believer's desire of the prayers of the feeblest Christian, or the new convert who has just formed an acquaintance with the Saviour. If they saw her Beloved, they were to be sure to inform him, that her love was so vehement, that it even caused her to sicken from a longing desire of reconciliation, and from sorrow that she had behaved so foolishly; and that, as a sick person, she could not relish any other comfort, but must continue to mourn and pine after his presence, till he forgave her and renewed his gracious visits.

V. 9. The daughters of Jerusalem, who are supposed to regard the spouse as one of matchless beauty, perceiving her great earnestness in seeking her Beloved, desire to know more of his distinguished excellencies, above all those whom others love. Some think that they propose this question, by way of derision of the vehemency of her affection and sorrow; and others, that they mean to alleviate her distress by leading her to expatiate on so pleasing a subject: but these things seem out of character for inquirers in religion, as we suppose the daughters of Jerusalem to be. They are rather to be considered as impressed with a conviction that there must be more preciousness in Christ, and comfort in communion with him, than they had hitherto imagined.

V. 10—16. In this description some reference is supposed to be had by the sacred writer to his father David, who was "ruddy and of a fair countenance;" and who was celebrated as having "slain his ten thousands;" (for the word rendered chief among, may signify, lifting up a standard over, &c.) His "head, as fine," or wrought "gold," is explained of the crown of gold worn by him, from under which his jetty and bushy hair hung down on his brow and neck. His eyes sparkled, yet with mildness, like those of doves, when highly delighted, at the river's side, (as some think the original means.) The words "washed with "milk," are supposed to relate to the doves, which were so white, that they appeared as if washed in milk. 'The 'lovely down upon his cheeks, is no less grateful, rising 'there like spices that first appear from their beds, or like 'the young buds of aromatic flowers; where the purple 'lilies are not more beautiful than his lips, from whence 'flow words more precious and more pleasant than the 'richest and most fragrant myrrh.' (Bp. Patrick.) (Purple or red lilies are found in those countries, and highly esteemed.) Some think that by "hands as gold rings "set with the beryl," the ornaments of his fingers and wrists are meant; that "his belly" or body, as bright ivory overlaid with sapphires, refers to the colour of the robe which he wore. Others imagine a reference to the rich garments of the high-priest, and the jewels in his breastplate and on his shoulders as an emblem of the high-priesthood of Christ: but this is very doubtful; and the richness or beauty of garments can hardly be considered as necessarily conveying an idea of pre-eminent personal comeliness and beauty. Similar allusions are supposed to be made to the covering of the legs and thighs, and feet, in the clause, 'His legs are as pillars of marble upon sockets 'of fine gold.' 'His aspect is no less stately and great 'than the forest of Lebanon, whose goodly cedars do not 'more excel all other trees, than he all other men.' (Bp. Patrick.) In short, 'he is altogether lovely or desirable.' But what instruction is conveyed under this description of the comeliness and majesty of the Beloved? No doubt the spiritual excellency and glory of Christ, in his person, mediation and kingdom, are intended: but, while in some things the meaning is evident, others must be allowed to be more doubtful. "He is white and ruddy;" this naturally suggests to the mind, his spotless purity and his atoning blood: and it may also denote his mercy to believers, and his terrible vengeance upon his enemies. "He is the chiefest "among ten thousand." By him kings reign. He is the King of saints, and of angels; and among ten thousand rivals, he alone is worthy of our affections, and capable of doing us effectual good. "His head as the most fine gold," may denote the perfect righteousness and inestimable benefits of his glorious kingdom, as Head over all to his church: "his locks, bushy, and black as a raven," may denote the vigour of his administration; full and black hair being an emblem of youth, as white hair of old age and wisdom: (Rev. i. 14:) "His eyes, as the eyes of doves, "by the rivers of waters, washed with milk, and fitly set," may denote his infinite knowledge, connected with purity and love, pleasant to his people, whom he watches over continually, and for whom he orders every thing in perfect wisdom and kindness. "His cheeks," that is, those glimpses of his glory which we have by faith, and when he lifts up the light of his countenance upon us, are refreshing as the most fragrant spices or flowers. His gracious words from his lips, are pure and pleasant like the lily, and distil upon the soul like the sweet-smelling myrrh. His hands, whether stretched forth to communicate blessings to us, or to uphold or defend us; or in any of the operations of his power, are "as gold rings, set with the beryl," all well-timed and placed, very precious, beneficial, and regulated in perfect wisdom and love. His belly, or bowels, (the known description of compassion and tenderness,) being "as bright ivory, overlaid with sapphires," may denote the glory of his mercy, which endureth for ever; and the unsearchable riches and invaluable privileges, which are conferred with it on all true believers. "His legs as "pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold," such as might form the support and ornament of some magnificent temple, may denote the firmness, power, and majesty, with which he supports his church, and maintains his cause in the world, against all the opposition of earth and hell. "His countenance as Lebanon, excellent as the cedars," denotes the unspeakable glory of his person and work, as fully displayed to the blessed inhabitants of heaven, of which whilst on earth we only obtain a few glimpses by faith. "His mouth being most sweet," seems to mean the expressions and pledges of his love, with which his people are favoured; (i. 2.) But indeed, concludes the spouse, "He is altogether lovely." All created and uncreated excellencies are found in Emmanuel's person; no defect or excess; no holy disposition intrenching on any other; every thing in perfect harmony and exact proportion: and every thing, in his mediatorial character and work, which suits the case of the sinner in the most absolute manner. This glorious and gracious Redeemer is the Beloved of every believer, who is favoured with reciprocal affection, and may be assured of His inviolable friendship and glory. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The Lord is ever ready to hear the prayers of his people; and he graciously accepts that worship or obedience which they present in humble faith, through the influences of his Holy Spirit, notwithstanding its imperfection. When he is honoured by our fruits of holiness, we shall find them comfortable and profitable to ourselves, and they will do much good to others, especially to the household of faith: and if we do not abundantly feast on the provisions of his grace, the fault lies in ourselves; for his invitations are as liberal and pressing, as the feast is plenteous and magnificent.—But alas, very often, when he stands at the door, and knocks for admission, that he may enter in and feast with us, we are half asleep: and even the riches of his condescending love and gracious consolations prove occasions, through our remaining depravity, to supineness: so that He is not only treated with ungrateful neglect by his enemies, but even by his friends! They are not indeed quite asleep; they hear and know his voice, in his word and providence, and acknowledge him as their beloved: yet they treat his most endearing compellations with inexcusable disregard, and notwithstanding his gracious invitations, and admonitions, and gentle reproofs, they still give way to sloth; nay, they quench his Holy Spirit, and refuse to comply with his suggestions when he shows them their duty, and their obligations to attend on it. Alas, what frivolous excuses do we often make for neglecting prayer and meditation, for absenting ourselves from public worship, the preaching of the word, and the Lord's Supper! How we shrink from any duty, which is attended with fatigue, self-denial expense, or reproach! How unprepared are we often for attending to the Lord's commands, and for performing the work of our station in his church! These are the shameful effects of former negligence, and yet we urge them as reasons for our present omissions! And if we were left to ourselves, we should gradually grow more secure and carnal, till we entirely returned back to sin and the world. But the gracious Saviour will not forsake his people, but will rebuke and chasten them. When he powerfully touches the heart, our drooping graces revive and our spiritual affections are re-kindled: then we have done with delays and excuses, and set ourselves in good earnest to use the means of grace, and to remove all obstacles to communion with him. But though these renewed exercises of repentance, faith, and love are accepted, yet he sometimes sees good to prevent our comfort in them: and they who wilfully quench the Holy Spirit, will often be left for a time to use every means of recovering his gracious consolations, without any apparent success, and even to pray without any tokens of being heard and answered. But if they truly love him, they will seek until they find: and the more diligently they persevere under discouragements, the sooner they will in general succeed. They should be reminded, however, that they will often fail of finding help from man: they need not wonder, if many, who appear as the watchmen of Zion, persecute, ridicule, or revile those who are earnest in seeking Jesus who was crucified: nay, should any disconsolate soul, who is waiting for some token of his love to him, meet with rebukes and sharpness even from a pious minister; let him remember that Jesus is far more compassionate than any of his servants, and will not quench the smoking flax, or break the bruised reed. In all our distresses, we should seek an interest in the prayers of God's people, without excepting those of the weakest believer; we should ever be ready to pray for those who are troubled in mind; and they, whose earnest desires after communion with Christ spoil their relish of other pleasures, will find this sickness a considerable step towards the true health of the soul.

V. 9—16.

There are many who deem pious Christians the excellent of the earth, who yet know not how to account for the energy of their language, when they speak of their love to Christ and fervent desires after him: not being duly aware how immensely their Beloved excels all those whom the world admires and idolizes. But did they know the whole of his personal and mediatorial excellency, they would only wonder that the love and gratitude of his most zealous disciples were so cold, and their desires so languid. Words indeed can never do justice to such a subject, or convey suitable ideas of it to the carnal mind: and, at our highest improvements in knowledge and experience, we only "see through a glass darkly." We should, however, endeavour, as we can, to show forth his praises; in hopes that the Lord will stir up others to inquire after and trust in him. For this end we may descant on the perfection of his righteousness, and the preciousness of his blood; his pre-eminence in wisdom, truth, and goodness, to all in heaven and earth; the glory of his kingdom, his power to save and to destroy; the vigour of his rule; the perfection of his knowledge and holiness; his compassion for sinners, and his tender care of his people. We may speak of the comforts of his manifested presence, his exhilarating promises, his instructive words: of the bounty of his donations, and the exact regularity of all his operations and dispensations for the good of his people: of his glorious and everlasting mercy, and all the blessings which we derive from his tender compassion; of his power as exercised in perfect truth and faithfulness; of his majesty and glory, as far excelling all the sons of the mighty, and only equalled by his condescension, and the sweet tokens of his love with which he favours the meanest believer. But after all we must confess that we cannot describe his glorious excellency; though we are assured, that he is altogether lovely. Surely then we ought to love him far more than we do; as he is not only most entirely worthy of it for his own excellency, but for his love to us and all its astonishing effects; and as he is the unchangeable Friend of all his people, and died for them when enemies, that he might reconcile them to God by his blood. But let us not be satisfied in expressing our love by words, and glorying in him as our Beloved and our Friend: may his love constrain us to live to his glory! this will best recommend his salvation to all around us, and lead them to inquire after him and trust in him, when they see what a holy and happy people we are made by his saving grace.

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1. The description, which the spouse had given of her Beloved, is represented, as having excited her companions to a determination of seeking him with her; and to an inquiry whither he was withdrawn, seeing she mourned his absence. This may be pointed out, as one among many passages, that seems to have little propriety in a literal meaning; for conjugal love is jealous, and does not readily allow of rivals; but they that love Christ, would have all the world love him too.

V. 2. The spouse on this inquiry immediately recollects where Christ is to be found; though she herself had been seeking him in vain. (V. 1.) Doubtless He is present with his church and assembled saints, which are as beds of spices, whence their spiritual worship ascends with acceptance. Here he feedeth with delight: or as a Shepherd he feedeth their souls by the supply of his Spirit. He also adds true converts to them, and continually gathers one and another into his heavenly kingdom. Christ goes down to this garden; which denotes both his condescension and the lowliness and low estate of his people. 'The whole 'denotes that communion with Christ is only to be sought 'in the church.' 'He was still in his church and in 'every part of it, though sometimes they were not sensible 'of it. For so Theodoret well observes, here is distinct 'mention of a garden and gardens: i. e. of the catholic 'church which is but one, and of the several parts of it. 'For sometimes St. Paul mentions the church in the 'singular number, and sometimes the several churches 'even in the same nation.' (1 Cor. xiv. 33. Gal. i. 2.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 3. 'Now she seems to have so perfectly recovered 'out of the slumber, as to have regained her former sense 'of him and of her interest in him, repeating those words 'which we have before met withal.' (Note, ii. 16.) Christ 'is said to feed among the lilies, as in the revelation, to 'walk in the midst of the golden candlesticks; that is, 'to take up his abode with them, as he said he would 'with those that "love him and keep his commandments." (John xiv. 21—23.) (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 4. The spouse having been suitably humbled, and persevering in the exercise of faith and holy love, Christ again manifests himself to her, and renews his commendations of her. Tirzah was afterwards the palace of the kings of Israel, and was no doubt situated very pleasantly; for its name signifies pleasant or amiable: and Jerusalem was the holy city, the capital of Canaan. This therefore implies, that all the real excellency and holiness on earth centres in the church. She is also said to be "terrible as "an army with banners:" a very extraordinary commendation of feminine beauty! But the church of God, when beautified in holiness and united in love, is very terrible to her enemies. Each believer, in his proper place, is the soldier of Christ, enlisted under his banner and a part of his army; by which He goes forth subduing his enemies, and rendering his truth triumphant over error and iniquity: whilst every one of them gains daily victories over the world, the flesh, and the devil. 'Every part of this verse 'seems to me a new proof, that Solomon speaks not in 'this book of one single person, (whom some fancy to be 'the Shulamite, others Pharaoh's daughter, whom others 'take for one and the same,) under the name of the 'spouse; but of a body or society of men: for none else 'can be fitly compared to cities, nay, to great armies 'drawn up under their banners.' (Bp. Patrick.) affection was so strong, that he was overcome by it, and could no longer retain any resentment for her late unkindness. When the Lord said to Moses, "Let me alone, "that I may destroy this people," it was the greatest conceivable encouragement to continue pleading for them: and this expression is equally animating to the desponding believer, to persevere in "looking unto Jesus," seeing he is thus sure of prevailing. To intimate an entire reconciliation, Christ uses the same expressions for substance, in commending the spouse, as he had before done. (Note, iv. 1—3.)

V. 8, 9. Some think that Solomon here alludes to the wives and concubines, and virgins attending them, which he had at this time in his court: but he seems rather to refer to the general custom of the eastern monarchs, which afterwards he himself imitated, nay, in which he exceeded them all. The language, however, implies, that though the earth abounds with such as are deemed honourable and amiable; yet true believers alone possess the beauty of holiness, with which no other can compare. Being united unto Christ, and born of God as the children of the church; being justified, sanctified, and approved as holy persons; they all form one body and possess one excellency, being of one heart and judgment in the grand concerns of religion: and when their real character is discovered, it must be admired and commended, even by those who seem the most to rival them, or to be eclipsed by them.

V. 10. Either Christ here continues his discourse, as in admiration of the spouse; or this is the commendation mentioned in the preceding verse. As applied to the church, it may be descriptive of the gradual dawning of the Gospel-day, from the first promise to fallen Adam, till the rising of the Sun of Righteousness and the calling of the Gentiles, or till the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in. On earth the church reflecting the light of Christ, is fair as the moon: in heaven, the full view of him and conformity to him, will render her clear as the sun: and both in her militant and triumphant state, she is terrible as an army with banners, or as the heavenly hosts, as some explain the word. The believer also, from his first conversion to his complete victory and salvation, may be represented by the same illustrations.

V. 11, 12. Christ here explains to the spouse his departure and return. Being grieved, he had left her: but he went down into his garden of nuts; he was still present in his church, and taking care of his people; especially he was present to note and accept "the fruits of the valley," the good works of the humble and discouraged; and to observe the flourishing of established Christians, and the first buddings of new converts. But his eye was on his spouse, on the offending mourner, whom he had rebuked by his frown and absence: and beholding her inconsolable and prepared for renewed comfort, he could no longer refrain; but was suddenly, as by instinct of affection, led to return to her, "like the chariots of Amminadib," who probably was noted for driving with great rapidity. The original may signify a willing or noble people.

V. 13. The spouse, ashamed of her misconduct, and conscious of her unworthiness, is represented as reluctant to believe that her Beloved is fully reconciled, or as not venturing to him with her former confidence, and as retiring from the company: but the daughters of Jerusalem, with great earnestness call on her to return, that they might behold her. The term, "the Shulamite," may be derived from Solomon the peaceable king, or rather from Salem the city of peace; and it seems to mean the peaceable, or the reconciled one. The spouse then inquires, what Christ, or the companions, can see in her worthy of attention? And he answers, "As it were the company of two armies." This may denote the Old and New Testament-churches: or the church militant and the church triumphant, as two armies: or it may refer to the believer's constant internal conflict betwixt inbred depravity and implanted holiness, which by turns prevail in his experience; and be supposed to refer to the spouse's late misconduct and repentance. But the word rendered company, signifies a band or chorus of dancers; or such as exult for joy; and some think the hosts of angels are meant, (with reference to Jacob's vision, Gen. xxxii. 1.) who rejoiced and sang praises at the Saviour's birth, and rejoice over one sinner that repenteth.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord commonly blesses the cordial praises of his people, to quicken others to desire his salvation, and to inquire how and where they may seek him with them.—The experienced believer, even when uncomfortable in his own soul, is both able and willing to direct inquirers to find the Saviour. By faith he apprehends his gracious presence in his church, and in all places where his ordinances are spiritually administered: these he knows to be the valued plantations of his grace, which he delights to tend, and where he raises those precious productions, which will continue in heaven for ever, to the glory of his name. Nor is the death of a believer any thing more than the owner of the garden plucking a favourite lily, which his immortal hand will preserve from withering, yea, cause to flourish for ever with increasing beauty. The discouraged believer frequently recovers his assurance of faith and hope, by expatiating on the preciousness of Christ, in recommending Him to others. The recollection of his mercy and grace, thus excited, encourage our souls to rely on them; and the consciousness that we speak from our heart, when we express a high valuation of him, tends to satisfy us that he is our Beloved, that we are his people, and that he is our Friend and Portion. The Lord will also honour those who thus honour him: he will not contend with his people any longer, when they are sufficiently humbled; and with the pardon of their sins, he will show his approbation of their general conduct and character.—The magnificent palace, the holy temple, and the army terrible with banners, are faint emblems of the comeliness and honour of the church, and of true believers. They are all enlisted under one commander, and arranged under his banners: they are well disciplined and armed, and courageous in faith and hope; and they fight assured of victory: yet this consists with the greatest lowliness, meekness, and love; and their victories are chiefly gained by faith and prayer, by patience and integrity, by holy lives and the faithful preaching of the word: and if these do not change their enemies into friends, they will be more awfully destructive to them than the most terrible weapons of war. When the penitent believer lifts the weeping eyes of humble faith and fervent love to the Lord Jesus, he is sure to prevail: and if the Saviour seem to frown, it is only an introduction to his manifested love; and his most forbidding words, rightly interpreted, encourages us "to pray always and not faint." The Lord will not upbraid us with any of those sins of which we truly repent: and therefore we should not upbraid each other. The tokens of his approbation and acceptance should encourage us with renewed diligence to follow after holiness; and to attend on his ordinances, that we may be more fruitful and useful, Whatever is most admired in the world is mean, compared with the beauty of holiness; some true Christians are more adorned with it than others: but this singular glory and excellency belongs, in a measure, to every member of that one body, of which Christ is the living Head. Washed in his blood and sanctified by his Spirit, they are undefiled, the children of God, and of his church, "without "rebuke, in the midst of a crooked and perverse world," amongst whom they shine as heavenly lights; and they will extort commendations even from prejudiced spectators on some occasions, and at length all nations shall call them blessed. Praised be God, the coming of Christ and the conversion of the Gentiles, have brought forward this day of heaven upon earth; may the universal spread of the Gospel extend the blessings of it to those nations that yet sit in darkness! But what is the fairest light of the moon, to the brightness of the sun? and what is the most glorious time of the church, or the happiest hour of a believer on earth, to the glory and felicity of the heavenly world? Then death will be swallowed up in victory; and every soldier of our Captain's host will triumph in the final perdition of all his foes. In the mean time, though we often mourn the Redeemer's absence from our souls, he will never withdraw from his church: he tends the fruits of his grace which spring in the lowliest valleys, and marks the first buddings in the new convert, or the feeble believer. He will never be so employed about some of his people as to neglect others: and he will return with unspeakable tenderness to those who mourn for the sins which urged his departure from them. But such humble and tender spirits can hardly be persuaded of their own happiness: and they see so much amiss in themselves, that they can hardly think that the Lord delights in them. But he is peculiarly pleased even with this their humility: he marks their constant opposition to their evil propensities: he makes allowances for the force of temptations; and distinguishes between a saint militant and a saint triumphant: and notwithstanding all defects and failures, he as much loves those who are strenuously fighting the good fight of faith, as those who through his grace have already obtained the victory.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. This verse, and those that follow, seem to be the language of the daughters of Jerusalem to the spouse, who was now returned to them. They call her "the Prince's daughter;" as the church is called the "King's daughter," by the Psalmist, (Ps. xlv. 13, 14:) for believers are the children of God, by regeneration, adoption, and union with the Only Begotten of the Father. The word rendered feet, more generally signifies goings, (Old Trans.) or footsteps, implying the spouse's becoming gait or motion. The shoes or sandals, in which she moved so gracefully, are explained by the apostle to mean "the "preparation of the Gospel of peace," by which believers are enabled to walk with becoming alacrity in the ways of holy obedience. (Marg. Ref.) Some render the next clause, "the cincture," or girdle, "of thy loins is like "jewels," &c. as rather denoting the beautiful garments or girdle worn by the spouse, than her graceful proportion and form of body: and, if we dwell on the external meaning, this may perhaps be requisite; and the believer "having his loins girt about with truth," may be referred to this interpretation. But the language of the apostle in another place, seems to point out the true meaning of the sacred allegory. "The whole body, fitly joined together, "and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, ac- "cording to the effectual working in the measure of every "part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of "itself in love." (Eph. iv. 15, 16. Col. ii. 19.) How greatly the due formation and proportion of "the joints of "the thighs," (namely, the knees and the hip-joints,) tend to the firmness and gracefulness of motion, every one knows. Thus every part of the church, even the meanest, is beautiful and useful, well-proportioned, and compacted, and fitted to glorify God. And every believer, in proportion to his faith and grace, is prepared to fill up his station in a becoming manner, and to walk in the ways of God with firmness and vigour. For "we are the body of "Christ," and "members in particular." (1 Cor. xii. 14—27.)

V. 2. Here again the decorations, rather than the person, of the spouse, are by some thought to be intended: and curious ornaments of embossed work, in the figure of a round goblet with liquor, or a heap, or sheaves of wheat, surrounded with lilies, carved on them, have been imagined and described. But the original words, in other places, as much mean the navel, and the belly or the womb, as the next words do the two breasts. In fact, the allusion to that part of the body, in which the infant is marvellously fashioned by the power of God, seems intended as an allegorical representation of the believer, through faith in Christ according to the word of the gospel, ripening into holy dispositions and affections, and thus into holy practice, those convictions and desires, which first influenced him to inquire after the Saviour: and also the provision, in the ordinances of the church for the conversion of sinners, and ripening them into established believers, the children of God our Saviour, and of his espoused church. The belly, or bowels, may likewise be explained of the merciful and compassionate disposition of believers, which renders them useful in relieving the distresses of the needy, "like "an heap of wheat," and is ornamental to their profession, as if the heap "was set about with lilies." We cannot, however, be confident, as to minute circumstances, in expounding these allegories; though the general meaning is plain. But we should not forget, that many other things in Scripture, as well as this description, do not accord to the refined and perhaps fastidious delicacy of modern times: yet we have every reason to believe that gross vice was much less general in those ages, among the Israelites at least, than it is at present. Nor does it become us to explain away the words of the sacred oracles.

V. 3. (iv. 5.) 'The two testaments, which are thy 'two full and comely breasts, (by whose wholesome milk 'thou nourishest all thy faithful children, once born into 'the light,) are for their excellent and perfect agreement, 'and their amiable proportion, like two young roes.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 4. Thy neck, &c. (iv. 4.) The word ivory added to the similitude of a tower for defence, may allude to the manifold preciousness of faith, in its various exercises. "Eyes like the fishpools in Heshbon," which probably were remarkable for clear and lucid waters, may denote distinct knowledge and penetration, and pure and useful wisdom, especially in the teachers of the church. The "nose as the tower of Lebanon," may denote spiritual sagacity, the result of a holy relish for divine things, and an experimental acquaintance with them. The sense of smelling is, as it were, the guardian of the stomach, and decides that this and the other viand is in a state unfit for food; so they, who have their spiritual senses exercised by use to discern good and evil, will distinguish betwixt truth and specious error, betwixt duty and specious transgression. And thus the believer, or the teachers of the church, will perceive at a distance the approaching danger of false doctrine or seducing temptation; as the watchmen from the tower of Lebanon, would see at a distance the enemies who should march that way from Damascus or its environs, where the Syrians, the formidable enemies of Israel, dwelt.

V. 5. "Thy head upon thee," is supposed by some to mean, the covering, or ornament of the head; and the word rendered hair, signifies a fillet or ribband, by which the hair was collected together. Carmel was a very high, pleasant, and fruitful mountain. Some understand "the "head upon thee," as that heavenly hope which springs from faith, and towers above earthly objects, and excites increasing vigour in following after holiness: and the hair-ribband like purple, (the colour of kings and rulers,) may mean the dignity of every action which is influenced by this high and purifying hope. But Christ himself, the Head of the church, and the honour conferred on the meanest believers by their union with him, may perhaps be intended. In short, so pleasant is the church and every member of it, that the King, the Lord of Hosts, is "held "in the galleries," or has such delight in the ordinances and assemblies of his saints, that he is not able to withdraw from them. 'When he walks in his palace, and 'beholds her beauty, he stands still, and cannot take his 'eyes off from her, being captivated with it.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 6—8. The Bridegroom is here supposed to enter, and to speak to the spouse, in the language of admiration and affection. 'How beautiful and pleasant art thou, O 'Love, for me to delight in!' He then proceeds to compare the stature, or person of the spouse, to the lofty and spreading palm; whilst her breasts, her entire love to Christ, and the obedience resulting from it, and the doctrine of the scriptures professed and maintained by her, were like clusters of grapes, the precious fruit of the vine. So that when, according to his promise, he went up to take hold of the branches of his palm-tree, he found them loaded with the most precious fruits, every way delightful to him; or, he engaged by his presence and grace to render her still more fruitful and useful, that he might still more rejoice over her to do her good. (Note, ii. 3.)

V. 9. The roof of the mouth is employed both in distinguishing tastes, and in articulating words: and the verse may mean, that the believer, having a relish for spiritual things, discourses upon them experimentally and pathetically. This is pleasant and refreshing, as the best wine, to those who are beloved of Christ; and he delights in it because they are comforted and edified by it: nay, such conversation tends to enliven aged and infirm believers; and even to awaken sleeping sinners, to inquire after Christ and to show forth his praise. 'The delivery of my word, by 'the mouths of my ministers, is like to the most excellent 'and pleasant wine; being both well accepted of that God 'in whose name it is taught, and most sweetly relished 'by the receivers; which is of such wonderful power, that 'it is able to put words both of repentance and praise, 'into the lips of him that lies asleep in his sins.' (Bp. Hall.) 'The word rendered asleep, may mean old men. 'The most generous wine, of which when we have tasted, 'we say, let it be sent to the best of my friends, is not 'more powerful to make old men brisk, or to enliven those 'that are at the point of death, than thy words are, &c.' (Bp. Patrick.)

V. 10—13. Here the spouse answers, as one assured of her relation to her Beloved, and of his endeared love to her. 'Seeing such is the desire of my Beloved towards 'me, that he first loved me when averse to him; he re-'called me when I wandered; he pardoned me when I 'offended; he studiously conferred benefits on me, and 'finally he gave himself to me.' 'There seems to be an 'allusion to Ps. xlv. 11; unto which, as I take it, Solo-'mon hath respect all along in this poem.' (Bp. Patrick.) She therefore desires to go forth with him into the fields, and to lodge in the villages: by which some suppose places newly enlightened by the Gospel to be intended. Assured hope and fervent love influence the believer to be weary of the noise and bustle of a vain world, and to value leisure and opportunity for retirement, communion with Christ, and an undisturbed attendance on his ordinances. He would be much employed in examining the growth of grace and fruitfulness in himself; and the interests of religion, the conversion of sinners, and the sanctity of believers are dear to his heart. He wants to know how the vine flourishes; and whether awakened sinners give hopeful proof of becoming fruitful in good works. There with the church of Christ, in his house, at his table, and at the throne of grace, he would profess and manifest his love to Christ, and give himself up without reserve to that holy, reasonable, and pleasant affection. Among such believers, living retired from the world, and in communion with Christ and each other, all kinds of ornamental, pleasant, and useful fruits are produced, from faith and love for his glory and for the benefit of his church: and these are not only the first-fruits, immediately after conversion, which may afterwards be called old; but also new services are performed, and new degrees of grace are exercised, more and more even to the end. It is not certainly known what the mandrakes were: perhaps they were melons. (Note, Gen. xxx. 14.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord Jesus is the true Fountain of honour; and his favour confers nobility, yea, royalty: for what are all the pompous titles of the world compared with this distinction, "The sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty?" "Such "honour have all his saints;" and having put on Christ, they are equally distinguished by their beautiful and glorious apparel. When their feet are shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace; and when, supplied with renewed strength from their great Head, through the intervention of ministers and Christians, each stationed in this mystical body with divine skill, they walk with increasing vigour and alacrity in the ways of holiness; every motion is graceful, and they "adorn the doctrine of God our "Saviour in all things." The holy desires of their hearts are brought to good effect by the supply of the Spirit of Christ; and their compassion and liberality relieve the wants of the indigent, and abound in many thanksgivings unto God. Faith worketh by love of God and of man, which (like two young roes that are twins,) produce a tenour of conduct, which accords to the example of their Beloved and their Friend. The precious faith and love, abounding in knowledge and all judgment, and regulated by sagacity, the result of experience and a spiritual mind, tend to the assurance of hope, the increase of holiness, and patient continuance in well doing. And the edifying discourse of such consistent believers honours Christ, recommends the gospel, silences gainsayers, animates other Christians, and tends to convince and awaken sinners; and will surely meet with the gracious commendation of the Lord. Wherever they meet together to worship, and to commemorate his love, Christ will be, as it were, "held "in the galleries," by his delight in them and their services: and to mark the difference betwixt them and formalists, he even expresses his admiration of the fruits of his own grace in them. They may also assure themselves, that he will be with them in their afflictions; and their resignation and patient hope under sharp sufferings is peculiarly pleasant and honourable to him. But when professors of the gospel do no credit to it in their lives, they drive him from their assemblies, and often deceive their own souls. In proportion as we are sure that Christ is our Beloved, and that we aim and desire to be devoted to him; we may also be sure, that he is our Salvation, and that his desire is towards us. And again, when this assurance is genuine, it will cause us more and more to count all but loss for him; and, as far as it consists with our duty in the community, to go forth with him to some sequestered humble retreat, where we may commune with him and his people, and with our own hearts. If then we have tasted his grace, let us seek his assistance in examining ourselves, to see how the vine flourishes, and to take heed that no subtle foxes spoil the tender grapes: let us show our love to Christ by love to his cause; and whilst we add new fruits of holiness to all those that we have already produced, let us not much regard whether men approve our conduct or not, provided our Beloved accept us and be honoured by us. Let us improve our talents and employ our influence, in observing how believers grow in grace, and young beginners put forth their tender buds, that we may exhort, encourage, warn, and pray for them, as time and occasion may require. And if we are favoured to see that part of the church, where we live, producing abundantly all the fruits of the Spirit, our joy will be more excited, than by any increase of riches, and our thanksgivings will accompany our supplications to the great Author of all our hopes and comforts. A life of this kind more resembles heaven, than any other that we can pass on earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1, 2. These verses may be understood as the fervent prayer of ancient believers, for the promised incarnation of the divine Saviour. In that mysterious dispensation the Lord of Glory, the Husband of the church, became as her Brother: and, as the man Jesus grew in wisdom, in attending on the ordinances of the Jewish church, he, as it were, "sucked the breasts of her "mother." The spouse, (representing ancient believers,) declares her determination, when she found him of whom Moses and the prophets had spoken, without, (that is, come down from heaven, and appearing in these outer courts of the temple,) she would with the utmost confidence express her affection to him and delight in him, without fear of being rejected, or of being despised by men for so doing. She determines also to avow her faith in him, and seek for his presence in his ordinances, that she might be further instructed in the truth; assured that her holy love, spiritual worship, and cheerful obedience, would be more acceptable to him, than the richest and most highly flavoured cordials.

V. 3, 4. (Note, ii. 6, 7.)

V. 5. Who is, &c.? The daughters of Jerusalem seem here to speak concerning the spouse, or the company of established believers, when in the most vigorous exercise of grace. By faith, hope, and love of Christ, they come up from this present evil world; which once, through the enchantments of sin and Satan, appeared to them a paradise; but now the charm is broken, they know it to be a waste howling wilderness. They therefore leave earthly for heavenly things, and still mount upward in holy desires, affections, and conversation; leaning upon the power, truth, and love of Christ: and in his strength surmounting difficulties, resisting temptations, bearing afflictions, and walking, without yielding to weariness or fainting, in the ways of holy obedience. In this heavenly course, the established believer appears wonderful to the inexperienced inquirer or feeble Christian, who can scarcely think it possible, that he can be enabled to follow an example so much above his present attainments.

I raised, &c. As the punctuation of the original makes the pronouns masculine, all that unreservedly adhere to it, suppose the spouse to speak in this sentence. But it is much more natural to consider it as the language of Christ. He raises up new converts, and matures his people, through his mediation and by his Spirit, giving efficacy to his word and ordinances. (Note, ii. 3.) Thus they receive their spiritual birth, nourishment, and comfort, in the church, the mother of us all. The word rendered brought thee forth, may mean pledged thee: for the church, especially in the Sacraments, solemnly dedicates all her children to Christ.

V. 6, 7. These verses seem to be the words of the spouse to Christ, entreating him to give her an abiding place in his love and protection by his power; setting her name, as with the deep impression of a seal, on his heart and on his arm; that she might neither lose her interest in his love, nor the comfort of it. In enforcing this request she represents the energy of holy love: if that were preserved in vigorous exercise, it would prove strong as death, and enable her to suffer every extremity, rather than renounce or dishonour him. But the very suspicion of not being the object of his love, would be cruel to her as the grave, or more dreadful than death in its most tremendous forms. For love resembles fire kindled among coals, or charcoal, made of those kinds of wood which emit the strongest heat and most vehement flame: and it is a fire that no floods of water can quench; that is, no temptations or sufferings can prevail against: nay, if a man possess this love, no wealth can hire him to renounce it; nor can any thing purchase it, or compensate for the want of it. The word rendered jealousy, may signify zeal. 'The jealous zeal 'which I have for thee, and for thy glory, consumes me, 'even like the grave, and burns me up like the coals of some 'most vehement and extreme fire.' (Bp. Hall.)—'It 'should be thus translated, "which are the flames of the "fire of the LORD." So the Hebrew word seems to 'signify, being compounded of three words, fire, flame, 'and the LORD;' (or JAH, the only time any name of God is used in this book.)—'Some translate it, "Such flames "are kindled only by the LORD;" 'and then, if there be 'an allusion to the breast-plate of the high-priest in the 'beginning of the verse, (Marg. Ref.) I fancy the con-'clusion may allude to "the fire that went out from before "the LORD, (Lev. ix. 24,) and devoured the sacrifices," 'as love doth all manner of difficulties. This fire was to 'burn perpetually upon the altar, and never be suffered to 'go out, (Lev. vi. 12, 13;) and therefore the best emblem 'of love that could be found.' (Bp. Patrick.) 'Wild 'beasts are not terrible to it, nor fire, nor precipices, nor 'the sea, nor the sword, nor the halter:—but even the 'most impassable difficulties are got over by it; the hardest 'things are presently mastered; the most frightful things 'easily surmounted, it is every where confident, overlooks 'all things, overpowers all things.' (Maximus Tyrius.) (Rom. viii. 35, and 1 Cor. xiii. 7. 2 Cor. v. 14, 15.)

V. 8, 9. The spouse, (or the church that then was,) seems here to intercede for the Gentiles, from among whom God intended to take a people for his name. The spouse therefore calls that future church, "a little sister, that hath "no breasts:" Though a few believers were even then found among the Gentiles, yet they had not the word of God, or the means of grace, and spiritual union with the promised Saviour. But in due time they would "be "spoken for" by him: and what was the Jewish church to do for them at that time, as instruments of affecting the gracious purposes of God? To this question Christ answers, "If she be a wall, we will build upon her a palace "of silver." If the commencement of this work, even the conversion of the Gentiles by the Spirit of Christ, through the preaching of apostles and evangelists, raised up from the nation of Israel, were likened to a wall built upon Him, the precious Foundation and Corner-stone, to become a part of a spiritual temple; they would be so multiplied, and enriched in process of time, that the Gentile church would become as a palace for the great King, builded of solid silver, and far more splendid than Solomon's temple. If the first preaching of the Gospel to them was compared to the making of a door, through the wall of partition, that door should be preserved most effectually, as if cased with boards of durable cedar.

V. 10. The ancient church seems here thankfully to reflect on her privileges: she was, before the coming of the Messiah, as a wall built on the precious Foundation, a part of the glorious temple that was to be erected; and the lively oracles and ordinances that she enjoyed were her security, as well as the sustenance and comfort of her children: and she was thus distinguished, because "then," (even when this difference originated,) "she was in his eyes as one that "found favour" and peace with him.

V. 11, 12. Solomon, it seems, had a large vineyard, which he did not superintend himself, but let it out to keepers, each of whom paid him a thousand pieces of silver, or shekels, for the fruit, and was supposed to clear two hundred. With allusion to this, the advantages and privileges of the ancient church are considered, according to frequent parables in Scripture, as a vineyard, intrusted by its owner to the rulers, teachers, and congregation of Israel: and the spouse, or church, determines to keep this vineyard, under her own immediate care; that it might abound in fruits of righteousness, to the honour of her Beloved, and the rich benefit of all employed in the care of it. (Notes, Is. v. 1—7. Matt. xxi. 33—43.) True believers in Israel understood these obligations, and had the vineyard before them, as their grand concern, and their endeavour was that much fruit might be produced. Thus the Lord received his revenue of praise; and the priests, Levites, prophets, and others, whose labours, prayers, and examples conduced to this end, were graciously recompensed; and when, (at the coming of Christ,) the stated teachers and rulers neglected their duty; apostles and evangelists were raised from the sound part of the ancient church, by whom the vineyard was successfully cultivated: and so the corrupt part of that church being excluded, the converted Gentiles were made the principal part of the vineyard, admitted to share all its privileges, and even still more abundant blessings.

V. 13, 14. These verses close the conference betwixt Christ and the spouse, and imply his personal absence from his people, during their continuance on earth. Christ first addresses her, as "dwelling in the gardens, or vineyard," (11, 12.) the assemblies and ordinances of his saints. The word companions being masculine, cannot mean the attendants on the spouse, so frequently mentioned, but rather those who were "the friends" and companions "of the "Bridegroom;" "the spirits of just men made perfect, "an innumerable company of angels;" and such men as John Baptist, the apostles, and the most eminent instruments of Christ, in establishing his church. 'Ask what 'thou wilt of me, and I tell thee before all thy compa-'nions, I will do it for thee.' (Bp. Patrick.) While the church professes her faith and love, and renders her worship, as in the presence of all the friends of her Beloved, the more she abounds in prayers and supplications, with thanksgivings, the greater measure of true prosperity and consolation she will enjoy. Thus our Lord, just before his crucifixion, again and again exhorted his disconsolate disciples, to "ask and receive, that their joy might be full." To this the spouse replies by craving his speedy return, not for a transient visit, but to take her to be wholly with him. The mountains in spices, seem to mean heaven and its exalted worship, of which all the incense and worship at the temple were a faint shadow. (Notes, ii. 17. iv. 6.) 'Solomon seems here to long for the first coming of Christ, 'as St. John doth for his last, who concludes his book of 'Revelation in the same manner, Even so, come Lord Jesus.' (Bp. Patrick.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

As the incarnation of the Son of God was the grand object of the believing prayers of the ancient church, so it should be the theme of our grateful joyful praises. Blessed be God, he hath "sent forth his Son, made of a woman, "and made under the law:" (Gal. iv. 4, 5.) "The second "Man is the Lord from heaven:" he dwells in our nature, and is not ashamed to call us brethren; and all the perfections of Deity conjoin with the tenderness of the most endeared relations, in his humanity, to render him the meet object of our confidence and love, and to show to us the divine character in a manner more suited to our apprehension and imitation. Having finished his work without, he is now ascended into heaven, to appear in the presence of God for us: but we may find him present to our faith in his holy ordinances, and there we may express our love, reverence, and submission; and render him our grateful worship, with the utmost freedom and assurance. He will not despise us for so doing, or even for our meanness and unworthiness; and we need not regard the contempt of those who "blaspheme that worthy name by which "we are called." Let us then seek his gracious presence in his church, that his ordinances and instructions may be abundantly useful to our souls, and that our worship and holy obedience may be accepted by him. Then he will renew the pledges of his love, and we shall find it good to be there; and shall fear whatever may interrupt the pleasant rest of our souls in him. Thus faith and hope will grow into full assurance; and leaning on his power, truth, and love, and cleaving to him as our Beloved, we shall rise superior to this vain world, and have our heart and conversation with him in heaven; and others shall see and admire our indifference about earthly things, compared with "those above, where Jesus sitteth at the right hand of God." Nor should we consider such attainments as out of our reach: let us but improve our privilege of access to the Mercy-seat; and when we have obtained some liberty in pouring out our hearts before him, let us strive to draw nearer and nearer to him, in fervency and importunity, wrestling for more and larger blessings; and we shall certainly obtain his effectual help. His love to us sinners was stronger than death; nor could all the floods of ungodly men or evil spirits, or inexpressible sufferings, quench that vehement flame; and all the kingdoms of the world were utterly contemned, when offered as a bribe to induce him to desist from his gracious purpose. Thus should our love to him be vigorous and victorious, that we may be ready to renounce or suffer any thing for his sake, and that we may be armed against the terrors and the friendship of the world. Indeed love is the most powerful principle of activity: and where that prevails, all dangers and difficulties will be disregarded, and every contrary interest utterly contemned. If then we have true faith, it will work by love of Christ, and the effects will soon become manifest in our whole conduct. Sometimes indeed, the fear of coming short of his love, or the temptation to forsake him, may be very painful to us: but we shall earnestly pray to be fixed as a seal on his heart and on his arm, that being kept in his mercy, and by his power, nothing in life or death may separate us from him.

V. 8—14.

The more our hearts glow with love to Christ, the greater will be our pity for those that "sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death." We are assured that he has a numerous people to gather into his fold, from among the Pagans, Jews, and every description of Anti-christians. These have not at present the oracles of God, or the means of grace; or they find them as dry breasts, through ignorance and unbelief. As the Lord then heard the prayers of his ancient church, as well as the intercession of his Son, for us sinners of the Gentiles, and hath begun to build us upon the foundation of his apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the chief Corner-stone, that we may be an habitation of God through the Spirit; and as the Gospel, having once been preached in our land, hath wonderfully been continued among us to this present day: so let us lift up our prayers for its spread all over the earth. Let us not imitate the unbelieving Jews who spake against the poor Gentiles, when the Gospel was sent among them: but let us continue to pray for that unhappy nation, that they may be again grafted into their own olive tree. Seeing we are in the eyes of the Lord, as those that have found favour, and have his holy word, as our security and consolation, let us learn to give the praise to his distinguishing grace. Let us also remember, that all our external privileges are talents committed to our trust: and wo be to all such in our congregations, as do not honour him in their lives in some measure answerable to their advantages. The Lord hath heretofore taken his vineyard from those that rendered not the fruits in their season; and he will not continue it long to any who imitate their corrupt example. Let each of us then place our vineyard before us, and earnestly seek grace, that we may profit by every ordinance and advantage: let every Christian endeavour suitably to perform the duty of his station, that "men may see his good works, and glorify "his heavenly Father:" and let him not forget, that the watchful faithful ministers, under whom his soul thrives, are entitled to a share of his affection and regard. Let ministers also watch over their part of the vineyard, as those who must give account, and who seek their recompense from their gracious Lord alone. All this becomes those who dwell in the gardens; and the fruit that we produce to his glory, will certainly redound to our own advantage. If we are enabled to act in this manner, new inquirers will hearken to our voice, and be instructed and admonished by our prudent counsel, while angels and saints in heaven rejoice over the success of our zealous endeavours, and our most condescending Lord will delight to hear our requests: and whilst we continue in prayer for whatever we want, our thanksgivings also will abound and our joy be full; our souls will be more and more enriched, and we shall be enabled to look forward to death and judgment with satisfaction, saying, "Make haste, my "Beloved, and be thou like to a roe, or to a young hart, "upon the mountains of spices." May the Lord thus prepare the writer and every reader, for his service on earth, and for the felicity of his heavenly kingdom!

THE BOOK

OF THE

PROPHET ISAIAH.

OUR blessed Lord, just before his ascension, said unto his disciples, "All things must be fulfilled, which were written in "the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning me. Then opened he their understandings, that "they might understand the scriptures." (Luke xxiv. 44, 45.) Hence we learn that the sacred volume of the Old Testament was divided, at that time, nearly in the same manner as at present; though there is some difficulty, and not much importance, in exactly determining which books belonged to the Prophets, and which to the Psalms. The historical books, however, from Joshua to Nehemiah, must have belonged to the prophets, in our Lord's days. Indeed all the sacred writers were prophets: and evident predictions of remote events are found in almost all the preceding books: but then, the prophetical part comes in rather occasionally, in the midst of other subjects; and in many instances, the prophet seems to have been led by the Holy Spirit, to foretel the most important and distant events, while he seemed to himself, or at least might appear to the reader, to be discoursing on another subject. But in the division of the Old Testament on which we now enter, prediction is evidently the principal subject; and other topics are introduced occasionally, on account of some kind of relation which they bore to the predictions: and the prophets knew and avowed, that they were foretelling future events. From Moses to Samuel, few prophets were raised up: "the word of the LORD was precious, —there was no open vision:" but Samuel established the schools of the prophets, and we read of a succession of them in every age, till the close of the sacred canon. They were in general, extraordinary instructors, sometimes in aid of the priests and Levites; but more commonly to supply their defects, when they neglected their duty. They were bold reformers, and reprovers of idolatry, iniquity, and hypocrisy: they called the attention of the people to the law of Moses, especially the moral law, the standard of true holiness; they showed the inefficacy of ceremonial observances, without the obedience of faith and love; and they kept up, and encouraged the expectation of the promised Messiah, and more fully declared his coming, "his sufferings, and the glory which should follow." Several of these prophets, nay, some of the most eminent, wrote nothing that we know of: others composed the historical records, that have been considered, (which contain also occasional predictions;) and other books of the same nature, from which extracts only have been preserved for our instruction. But at length some of them were commanded to commit their messages to writing; and these constitute the books on which we now enter. Tradition informs us, that the prophets, having written the message, and delivered it as directed, affixed it to the door of the temple, where it continued some time, and was then taken down by the priests, and entered into their registers: but the persecutions which the prophets generally endured, from both priests and people, render this doubtful, nor can we exactly know in what way they were preserved. This, however, is not material; no learned man is anxious to know in what manner Homer's Iliad, Virgil's Æneid, or Tully's Orations, were rescued from the general wreck of ancient writings. They exist, and vouch their own authenticity. How much more, then, do those prophecies, which have been fulfilling for ages, and are fulfilling at this day, demand our attention by their internal evidence! In addition to this, however, the authority of both Jews and Christians, and above all of Christ and his apostles, transmits them to us as the oracles of God. As the prophets did not teach any new doctrines, commands, or ordinances, but appealed to their authenticated records; it was not needful that they should confirm their messages, with that immense weight of public miracles, with which the dispensation of Moses, and the gospel of Christ were introduced: 'Their pretensions to be considered as God's appointed servants, were demonstrated by the unimpeachable integrity of 'their characters, by the intrinsic excellence and tendency of their Instructions; and by the disinterested zeal and un-'daunted fortitude, with which they persevered in their great designs. These were still further confirmed by the miraculous proofs which they gave of divine support, and by the immediate completion of many smaller predictions, which they uttered. 'Such were their credentials to their contemporaries: and we, who having lived to witness the second dispensation, can look 'back to the connexion which subsisted between the two covenants, have received additional evidence of the inspiration of 'the prophets, in the attestations of our Saviour and his apostles; and in the retrospect of a germinant, and gradually 'maturing scheme of prophecy, connected in all its parts, and ratified in its great object, the advent of the Messiah. We 'have still further incontrovertible proof of their divine appointment, in the numerous prophecies, which in these latter 'days are fulfilled, and still under our own eyes continue to receive their completion. The language of the prophets, 'also, is remarkable for its magnificence. Each of the writers is distinguished for peculiar beauties: but their style in 'general may be characterized as strong, animated, and impressive. Its ornaments are derived, not from accumulation 'of epithet, or laboured harmony; but from the real grandeur of its images, and the majestic force of its expressions. 'It is varied with striking propriety, and enlivened with quick but easy transitions. Its sudden bursts of eloquence, its 'earnest warmth, its affecting exhortations and appeals, afford very interesting proofs of that lively impression, and of 'that inspired conviction, under which the prophets rot we, and which enabled them, among a people not distinguished for 'genius, to surpass in every variety of composition, the most admired productions of pagan antiquity. The greatest 'part of the prophetic books, were written in some kind of measure or verse.'—But, 'as the Hebrew has been a dead 'language for nearly two thousand years, we can have no power of ascertaining the pronunciation, or even the number 'of the syllables. The quantity and rhythm of its verse must therefore have entirely perished, and there can be no mode 'of discovering the rules by which they were governed.' (Gray's Key.)—Much has been written concerning the different degrees of inspiration with which the prophets were endowed: but, I own, I never found satisfaction in any discussion of this subject. Certainly the scriptures intimate some disparity between Moses and other prophets, and several ways in which divine communications were made: and let others determine what credit is due to the rabbinical determinations in this respect. It seems enough to observe, that the credit of scriptural prophecy does not depend on such distinctions, but on internal evidence; and the highest authority, that "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the "Holy Ghost." Probably none, except prophets, ever had an idea, how the illapses of the Holy Spirit came into their minds, and beyond doubt evinced their divine origin. All the prophets were so superintended, both as to the words used by them, and the messages delivered, as to be preserved from error, and to give us the very word of God: and this is enough for our satisfaction. Many things, however, relative to this subject, will come in our way, and an opinion will be given on them, as we proceed. It should be peculiarly observed, by every diligent student of the sacred scriptures, how constantly the preceding history is assumed for granted, and as certainly known and believed by the people, in every part of the prophetical writings; and in what numerous instances they are quoted as "the scriptures, which cannot be broken," and the oracles of God, in the New Testament. It would carry me much further than this introductory dissertation will admit, to enter into particulars: let the reader consult the marginal references, and doubt if he can, whether the historical books, preceding the time of each prophet, were not extant and deemed authentic, when he wrote; and whether Christ and his apostles did not consider the whole as the word of God. The distinction between the greater and the minor prophets cannot well be passed over in silence, in this place: but it means no more than, that the prophecies transmitted to us of some of them, are more than those of others; but not at all of higher authority.

'To encourage men in searches of this kind,' (that is of the prophetical writings,) 'they will find such an 'harmony and correspondence between the emblems, whereby the prophets point out things to come, that the care-'ful comparing of them with each other will afford the best clue to guide the attentive reader through the most 'difficult parts of their writings; and is likewise a most surprising proof, that they all wrote by the direction 'of one and the self-same Spirit.' 'I confess I can by no means approve of the opinion of some learned men, 'who are for cramping the sense of the prophets, and confining them within as narrow a compass as possible. 'I must own myself puzzled, to assign a reason, why God should appoint a succession of prophets, to foretel 'what should come to pass within the compass of about three hundred years, (for within that time most of those 'prophets lived, whose writings make up this part of the scripture-canon,) and take no notice of any other oc-'currences, which should happen in succeeding times. I desire it may be considered that the prophecies, which 'foretel the visibility and universality of Christ's church, accompanied with perfect peace, prosperity, and holi-'ness, cannot with any probability, be said to have yet received their accomplishment; as neither have those 'predictions which foretel the flourishing state of the Jews in the latter times: and to suppose those prophecies to

'have already received their utmost completion, is, in my judgment, to acknowledge that they never were, nor 'will be, fulfilled in their natural and obvious sense.' 'The ancient Jews always acknowledged that the chief 'design of the prophets was to foretel the times of the Messiah: and when Christ and his apostles explained 'the prophecies in a spiritual and mystical sense, they interpreted them according to the received notions of the 'synagogue, and are never taxed, that we find, for misapplying particular texts, as if they did not belong to the 'times of the Messiah. It does not appear that ever this was called in question, till the Jews came to engage in 'dispute with the Christians.' (Lowth.)—These hints may prepare the reader for that mode of interpreting the prophetical writings, which is adopted in this publication, and throw light on the subject.

The prophet Isaiah, on whose writings we first enter, is remarkable for the eloquence and sublimity of his style and imagery; in which the best judges have decidedly given him the preference to the most admired writers of antiquity. He is equally distinguished by the plain and copious manner in which he speaks of Christ and the times of the gospel: on this account he hath been called The Fifth Evangelist. The book opens with sharp rebukes of the people for their idolatry and iniquity, and denunciations of divine vengeance upon them; but intermixed with encouraging intimations of mercy and predictions of Christ. Afterwards follow various prophecies of judgments about to be executed on several nations, as well as on Judah; through all of which the reader is led to expect future deliverances, and glorious times to the church of God. Then there is inserted an account of Sennacherib's invasion, and of some particulars relating to Hezekiah, that end in a prediction of the Babylonish captivity. The prophet then copiously enlarges upon the deliverance of his people from that calamitous state, in language peculiarly applicable to the spiritual redemption of Christ: at length he drops in great measure, types and shadows, and speaks in the most emphatical language of his person, sufferings, and glory; and of those things that pertain to the spread of his gospel and the setting up of his kingdom on earth; until he closes with descriptions, which lead the mind to consider the final felicity of the righteous, and the misery of the wicked in another world. We shall find the whole book replete with instruction: especially we shall meet with the most decisive internal evidence of its divine original, and it will reflect light on every part of the sacred volume, on which all our hopes of happiness are founded.

'Isaiah is certainly one of the most difficult of all the prophets, though perhaps few are sensible of it but they who 'try to explain him. The profoundness of his thoughts, the loftiness of his expression, and the extent of his 'prophecy, have made the commentaries hitherto written upon him, fall short of a full explication of his book: 'and he that will undertake to fathom the depths of this prophecy, is in great danger of going out of his own. 'The prophet seems to have been favoured with an entire view of the gospel-state, from the very birth of the Mes- 'siah, to that glorious period, when "the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdom of the Lord, and of "his Christ."—'In those parts of the exposition, where mention is made of the Jews being restored to their own 'land, &c.; let the reader not consider what is said on these obscure subjects as positive assertions, but only 'as probable conjectures. For in these, and such like abstruse matters,—a modest man should not pretend to 'be wise above what is plainly and expressly written.' (Lowth.)

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1. The name of the prophet, signifying 'the salvation of the Lord,' was very suitable to the subject on which he so frequently and delightfully expatiated, and which hath procured him the title of 'the 'evangelical prophet,' nay, of 'the fifth Evangelist.' Tradition reports that he was of noble birth, and that his daughter was married to Manasseh, and that he was sawn asunder by the command of that idolatrous prince, to which the apostle is supposed to allude. (Heb. xi. 37.) It must, however, be allowed that these traditions are very uncertain; and some think he did not survive Hezekiah: yet, even in that case, he must have prophesied about sixty years at least. In general, the reader must be referred to the notes on the second book of Kings, from the fifteenth to the twenty-first chapter, inclusive; and to the second book of Chronicles, from the twenty-sixth to the thirty-third chapter inclusive, for the state of Judah and Israel during the term of years in which Isaiah prophesied.—Many of his prophecies, indeed, relate to other kingdoms; but always on account of their connexion, one way or other, with the chosen race. 'The two usual ways 'whereby God communicated his will to the prophets, 'were visions and dreams.' (Num. xii. 6.) 'In vision 'the inspired person was awake, but his external senses 'were bound up, and as it were laid asleep in a trance.—'It is called vision, not from any use of the corporeal 'sight, but because of the clearness and evidence of the 'things revealed.' (2 Cor. xii. 1—4.) 'It was sometimes 'accompanied with external representations. (vi. 1—8. Ez. i. x. xl.—xlviii. Rev. xxi. 10—27.) (Lowth.) This chapter may be considered as an introductory address prefixed to the subsequent prophecies; and the title may belong to the book in general, or to the chapter in particular. It is thought that this was not Isaiah's first vision, though placed as an introduction to the rest.

V. 2. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 1. Ps. xlix. 1—4. c. 1—3.) The Lord, in this as in many other places, appeals to the whole creation, in the controversy betwixt him and his people: he had brought them up with all the tenderness and attention of a parent; but they had ungratefully rebelled against him, and apostatized to worthless idols. The word rendered brought up, generally means exalted: God had greatly exalted Israel, which aggravated the guilt of their rebellion.

V. 3. The most stupid of the domestic animals are observant of the hand by which, and the place where, they are fed, though the owner seeks only his own interest in his care of them: but God's highly favoured people did not know or understand their immense obligations, nor consider their own true interest, which could only be secured by cleaving to Him. 'The Israelites, though chosen by the mere favour of 'God, adopted as sons, promoted to the highest dignity; 'yet acknowledged not their Lord and their God, but de-'spised his commandments; though in the highest degree 'equitable and just.' (Bochart in Bp. Lowth.)

V. 4. 'They were not only wicked as their fathers, 'but totally corrupt, and by their evil examples corrupted 'others.' Every generation of Israel degenerated more and more from the faith and piety of their ancestors: they were not only corrupted in their early years; but the very children were corrupters and tempters of others; a circumstance extremely affecting to those who mark the progress of impiety. In short, almost the whole nation were estranged from the Lord, and had turned their backs on him and on his holy service.

7 Your [y] country is desolate, your cities are [z] burned with fire: your land, [a] strangers devour it in your presence, and it is desolate, as * overthrown by strangers.

8 And [b] the daughter of Zion is left [c] as a cottage in a vineyard, as a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, [d] as a besieged city.

9 Except the LORD of hosts had [e] left unto us [f] a very small remnant, [g] we should have been as Sodom, and we should have been like unto Gomorrah.

10 ¶ [h] Hear the word of the LORD, ye rulers of [i] Sodom; give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah:

11 To [k] what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the LORD: I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts; and I delight not in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of † he-goats.

12 When [l] ye come to ‡appear before me, who hath [m] required this at your hand, to tread my courts?

13 Bring no more [n] vain oblations: [o] incense is an abomination unto me; [p] the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with: [q] it is ◊ iniquity, even the solemn meeting.

14 Your new moons and your appointed feasts [r] my soul hateth: they are a trouble unto me; [s] I am weary to bear them.

15 And, [t] when ye spread forth your hands, [u] I will hide mine eyes from you; yea, when ye ‖ make many prayers I will not hear: [x] your hands are full of * blood.

V. 5, 6. The wickedness of the people was become so incorrigible, that it would answer no purpose to inflict any further chastisement, seeing they would "revolt more and "more:" and what doth it avail to throw away medicines on the dying patient, when they only exasperate his disease? They might therefore as well be let alone, till ripe for utter destruction. Or the sentence may mean, that they were so covered with the wounds and bruises of their former smitings, that it might be inquired, where another stroke could be inflicted? Or, why would they persist in those crimes, which ensured further punishment, when they were already in so miserable a situation? The following metaphorical description may relate either to their corrupt state in respect to religion, or to their calamities. In the former sense, even the princes and prophets or priests, (the head and the heart of the body politic and ecclesiastical,) were altogether sick and faint, as at the approach of death; religion and justice were expiring; idolatry, impiety, hypocrisy, and every kind of iniquity, were become almost universal; the disease had been so long increasing, and magistrates and ministers had so neglected the proper means of checking its progress, that the whole body was, as it were, ulcerated, putrefying, and tending to one general mortification. The passage may be accommodated as an illustration of the total depravity of human nature, but ought by no means to be adduced as a proof of the doctrine; which it cannot be, except as the depraved state of Judah was a fact that can on no other principles be accounted for.

V. 7—9. The prosperous state of Judah, during the reigns of Uzziah and Jotham, does not accord to the description here given: and therefore commentators have generally dated this chapter in the beginning of the reign of Ahaz: though it has been thought that it might be written in the close of Jotham's reign, (2 Kings xv. 37.) The enemy so desolated the land, that Jerusalem alone was protected from their ravages; and that city was so shut up, impoverished, and left alone, that it resembled a hut erected to accommodate the gardeners, who during a few weeks watched their cucumbers and melons from being destroyed by the jackals or foxes, or stolen during the night. Zion, with her children or inhabitants, thus cut off from communication with the neighbouring country, resembled a besieged city, rather than one taken by siege, as some would read it. And in general, whilst any instructive sense can be made of the Hebrew text, as it now stands, it behooves us to be very cautious how we sanction the efforts of those who would alter whatever accords not to their views, and thus in fact give us their own opinions, instead of the "word "of God." But few passages will be left, that need alteration, if we adhere to this rule: and perhaps it will be better to consider them as trials of our modesty, than by bold conjecture, or on dubious authority, to make out new meanings and sentences, and add them to God's word; (Note, Prov. xxx. 6.) The LORD of hosts, the God of armies, had a small remnant of pious servants at Jerusalem, and for their sakes he preserved a remnant of the nation: otherwise as their crimes had equalled, so their punishment would have resembled, that of Sodom and Gomorrah.

V. 10—15. From the mention of Sodom and Gomorrah, the prophet took occasion, with a holy indignation, to address the rulers of Judah, under the title of "the "rulers of Sodom," and the citizens of Jerusalem, as "the inhabitants of Gomorrah." Many of them still attended to the ritual observances, in their sacrifices and solemnities: but their oblations were vain, and their very incense an abomination: nay, the Lord was not only weary of their solemn feasts, and hated them: but he would pay no regard to their multiplied prayers, though offered with great apparent devotion. And the reason was evident: they were mere hypocrites: they neither regarded the typical intention of the sacrifices and ceremonies, nor used them as means of sanctification: but proudly relied on the form as a meritorious service; and wickedly used their pretence of devotion, either as a cloak of atrocious murders and oppressions, or as a compensation for them. Their hands were full of blood-guiltiness, of which they did not repent, and from which they did not desist. (Marg. Ref.) "The solemn meeting," or the day of restraint. 'Certain holy days, ordained by the law, were distin-'guished by a particular charge, that "no servile work "should be done therein." (Lev. xxiii. 36. Num. xxix. '35. Deut. xvi. 8.) This circumstance clearly explains 'the reason of the name, the restraint, given to those 'days.' (Bp. Lowth.) The great day of atonement seems especially meant. (Lev. ix.) 'Although God commanded 'the sacrifices for a time, as aids and exercises of their 'faith: yet, because the people had not faith and repent-'ance, God detested them.'

V. 16—20. This exhortation to the degenerate Jews implies, though it does not expressly mention, the mercy and grace of God through their promised Messiah; by which they might be enabled to do the duties here insisted on, and also to obtain acceptance. Attending to these reasonable exhortations, their guilt, though most atrocious, would be pardoned, and their national prosperity restored: otherwise their ruin was inevitable. The words rendered "relieve the oppressed," are translated by some learned men, "amend that which it has corrupted;" but perhaps they mean, "make happy such as are bitter of soul." 'The 'word rendered "reason together," signifies properly for 'two contending parties to argue the case together; but 'here it seems to mean the effect or issue of such a debate, 'viz. the accommodating their differences.) (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) It is plain, from this and other similar passages, that legal sacrifices could not atone even for external national crimes, where public reformation was generally neglected. 'This kind of reasoning by the second table, 'the scriptures use in many places against the hypocrites 'who pretend most holiness and religion in word; but when 'the charity and love towards their brethren should ap-'pear, they declare that they have neither faith nor re-'ligion.'

V. 21—24. In the time of David, and in the former part of Solomon's reign, Jerusalem was indeed a holy city, a proper type of the true church, the faithful spouse of Christ: but notwithstanding all her distinguished advantages, this once virtuous matron was become a vile harlot, to the astonishment and regret of all the true servants of JEHOVAH; and instead of wholly adhering to his worship, she was most grievously defiled with idolatry, and also was become a receptacle of murderers and robbers. Nay, the apparent religion that remained was hypocritical, dross and not silver; or at best, wine mixed with water, by which it had lost it strength and flavour. Therefore the Lord of Hosts, the mighty One who had so often delivered Israel, with most tremendous emphasis declared, "that he would "ease him of his adversaries, and avenge him of his ene-"mies." The expressions are taken from the uneasiness which men feel, when provoked to anger by multiplied insults, and the relief and pleasure that revenge affords them. All that is discomposing, and the effect of our sinful passions, must be removed from our conception of the divine conduct, as thus delineated: but such language strongly marks God's abhorrence of sin, and his love of justice. He has no pleasure in the sufferings of wicked men; but, as Governor of the universe, he greatly delighteth in honouring his own law, and displaying his own righteous and holy character, and he will therefore avenge himself on all incorrigible transgressors. It is remarkable, that whereas the 'Greeks and Latins by mixt wine, always meant wine di-'luted and lowered by water; the Hebrews, on the contra-'ry, mean wine made stronger and more inebriating, by 'the addition of higher and more powerful ingredients. (v. 22. Cant. viii. 2. Prov. xxiii. 30.) The eastern people 'to this day deal in artificial liquors of prodigious strength, 'the use of wine being forbidden.' (Bp. Lowth.) Wine mixed with water would therefore convey the idea of wine debased and become worthless. The Septuagint render the clause; 'Thy vintners mix thy wine with water.' The apostle uses the same word in speaking of the gospel, when corrupted by base mixtures. (Note, 2 Cor. ii. 14. 17.)

26 And [x] I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward [y] thou shalt be called, The city of righteousness, The faithful city.

27 Zion shall be [z] redeemed with judgment, and * her converts with righteousness.

28 And [a] the † destruction of the transgressors and of the sinners shall be together, and [b] they that forsake the LORD shall be consumed.

V. 25—27. The Lord did not mean so to destroy an hypocritical and wicked nation, as to leave no remnant: but he foretold, for the encouragement of the pious few, that "he would turn his hand upon Zion" to cleanse her, and on the incorrigible to punish them. (2 Sam. viii. 3. Ps. lxxxi. 14. Zech. xiii. 7. Original.) His most tremendous judgments should be as the fire of a purifying furnace, to separate all dross and alloy of base metal from her silver; to destroy hypocrites from among her worshippers, and to make believers more holy and spiritual. Then judges and counsellors, like David and other pious persons in her first and best days, should be raised up, under whom so blessed a change should take place, that Jerusalem should be called "The city of righteousness, the faithful metropolis." For Zion and her worshippers should be redeemed from enemies and abuses; and new converts should be added to her, by the righteous judgments that had been foretold. 'When God 'shall redeem Zion, and restore those that truly turn to 'him, he will make a remarkable discrimination between 'the righteous and the wicked. His judgment will be 'visible in punishing the latter, and his mercy in saving 'the former.' (Lowth.)—The display of the divine justice, as well as mercy, in the way of the sinner's salvation, may also be intended. The calamities of Ahaz, Sennacherib's invasion, the distress it occasioned, its surprising event, and Hezekiah's reformation, were accomplishments of this prediction: and so were the Babylonish captivity, the redemption of the captive Jews, and their consequent adherence to the worship of JEHOVAH. But the redemption of the spiritual Zion, by the righteousness and death of Christ, and by his powerful grace; her repeated deliverances by his righteous judgments on her enemies; her prosperity and increase under his government; and her comparative purity on earth and perfect purity in heaven, fully accord to the meaning of this energetic language. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 28—31. The ruin of apostates and all wicked persons, attends the purity and prosperity of the true church; and will come upon them suddenly, at once, and on all of them together, so that they cannot help each other. The idols, and the groves or gardens, which the Jews preferred to the worship of JEHOVAH at his temple, would shortly turn to their confusion. (Marg. Ref.) The word rendered oaks, probably means some trees of the ever-green species: and it was predicted that the wicked Jews should become as one of them, when being blasted by excessive heat, all its leaves fade at once; and as a garden without water, which in those hot countries must very soon be utterly burnt up. Nay, the most potent of them would become "as tow, and "his work," (Marg.) as a spark to set fire to it; and thus they should burn together without being quenched. This may describe the wretched state of the Jewish nation, especially when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans; and the destruction of the idols with the idolaters, so that the nation never afterwards relapsed into gross idolatry. The ruin of Anti-christian, as well as Pagan, idolatry, attended with dreadful judgments on the incorrigible idolaters, seems also predicted: but the language most emphatically describes the state of the wicked in another world; when all their idolized possessions, vain confidences, superstitions, hypocritical and ostentatious services, as well as wicked works, will terminate in confusion and anguish, and aggravate their tremendous doom.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The varied, persevering, and suitable methods, which the Lord employs to check the progress of impiety and iniquity, to bring sinners to repentance, and to retain his people in his worship and service, eventually demonstrate the power of man's depravity, leave sinners more inexcusable in their crimes, and tend to manifest the justice of God in their punishment. We should therefore seek his grace, to render every means effectual, with earnestness proportioned to the number of our peculiar advantages: else the Gospel of Christ will become a savour of death to us; and the heavens and the earth will declare his righteousness in our condemnation. Man, each man, owes his reasonable powers and valuable distinctions, to his Maker's goodness: he is upheld by his power, and feasted by his bounty, and treated as a favourite child: and yet he alone, as a monster of ingratitude, spurns his authority, and treats his gracious Friend and Father with contempt and enmity! The dull ox and ass, (as well as the most sagacious animals,) whilst they express a kind of gratitude to the hand that feeds them, judge and condemn the human race, who know not the truths, perfections, or will of their Creator, or who do not consider their folly and criminality in rebelling against him. Where then is he, who can justify himself before God, or even at the bar of his own conscience? If we were appointed to judge ourselves, and had matters fairly stated before us, and no part of the evidence suppressed, we

CHAP. II.

Predictions of the establishment, extent, and peace of the church, in the days of the Messiah, 1—5: of the rejection of the Jews for their iniquities and idolatries, 6—9: of divine judgments, which would be employed to humble their pride, cure them of idolatry, and cause them to cease from confidence in man, 16—22.

should almost be constrained to take his part against ourselves; no wonder then, that at last "every mouth will "be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God." But the rebellion and ingratitude of those who are favoured with his oracles and ordinances, are peculiarly aggravated; and the impiety and wickedness of nations professing Christianity, display a sottishness and a contempt of God, equally astonishing and detestable. With what justice and propriety, then, might JEHOVAH address this favoured land, as he did Judah of old, "Ah, sinful nation! a people "laden with iniquity!" Our degeneracy from the faith, zeal, piety, purity, and patience, which marked our national character during the progress of the reformation, into open infidelity, impiety, licentiousness, fraud, and perjury, marks us to be a people laden with iniquity. The early proficiency of numbers of our youth in vice and irreligion, and in tempting others to wickedness, mark them to be "children that are corrupters." In short, as a nation, we have generally "forsaken the LORD, provoked "the Holy One of Israel to anger," and are estranged from him. The patience of God hath indeed hitherto preserved us from proportionable calamities: we hope that it is not because he hath given us up as incorrigible; "seeing we revolt more and more" in the midst both of judgments and mercies. But though it cannot be said, "Your country is desolate, your cities are burned with "fire, your land strangers devour it in your presence:" yet, were it not for a few honourable exceptions, it might be said, as to our religious character, "The whole "head is sick, the whole heart is faint." The malignant distemper also breaks forth in every part, and pervades with dire progress all orders and ranks of men: an impious and infidel contempt of the word and ordinances of God, appears every day more avowed: nay, even they who are maintained in affluence, to promote the cause of true Christianity, often appear in the opposite phalanx, or by their doctrines and examples betray her cause! nor does any one call them to account for so doing! So that the wounds and bruises, under which the religion of the land lies gasping, "have not been closed, nor bound up, "nor mollified with ointment:" and whilst we seem to prosper in our civil estate, the daughter of Zion, the cause of the Gospel, is left as a cottage in a vineyard, and as a besieged city, against which the hosts of aliens encamp on every side, with proud menaces and boastings, as if they were about to swallow her up! "Except the LORD of "hosts had left unto us a very small remnant, we should "have become like Sodom and Gomorrah," in wickedness and in desolation: and doubtless the inhabitants of those cities will rise up in judgment, and condemn numbers in Britain, who are daring in their iniquity amidst so many superior advantages. How dreadful then must be the depravity of human nature, which grows so exceeding wicked under the most suitable means of becoming holy! Surely in this respect too it may be said, "the whole head "is sick, and the whole heart faint!" This evil nature is in every one of us: and no physician, or medicine, but Jesus and his sanctifying Spirit, can restore us to spiritual health. Let us then put our distempered souls into his hands, that the wounds, bruises, and putrefying sores may be mollified and bound up, and closed by his healing care. Thus alone can our ruin be prevented, and holiness and happiness be restored to our souls. Blessed be God, there is a remnant, (though but a small remnant,) of such believers, for whose sake, and in answer to whose prayers, the Lord hath hitherto spared us; and whose examples and endeavours may yet prevail to revive the power of godliness throughout our land. To them let us cordially attach ourselves, and join our prayers and endeavours with theirs. Nor should we despair, even if we saw the rulers and inhabitants of the land generally like those of Sodom. The cause is not lost, whilst any witnesses for the truth remain, to preach, and write, and protest, and pray against prevailing impiety and infidelity; or to oppose a holy example to the torrent of iniquity and licentiousness.

V. 10—20.

Many are apt to think that none except infidels and profligates are in danger of impending vengeance: but, in fact, hypocrites are at least as vile as they. Indeed the form of godliness has very generally been thrown aside among us as a useless encumbrance. Yet it may be feared that there are many who attend places of public worship, nay, contribute largely to the expense of building and supporting them; who hear, or even preach, many sermons; who zealously profess and dispute about the capital truths of the gospel; who are found stated communicants at the Lord's table, and even offer many prayers with apparent devotion; to whom the Lord may justly say, 'To what purpose are all these services? I can have 'no delight in your services, nor you any profit from 'them. Who hath required persons of your character 'and allowed conduct, to appear before me and tread my 'courts? I am wearied with and even loathe your worship, 'your sacraments, your costly and ostentatious services: 'affront me no more with your hateful and disgusting 'devotions, which are merely the cloak of injustice and 'impenitency. I will hear none of your hypocritical 'prayers; and your public fasts and solemn meetings 'are iniquity; for your hands are full of blood, of fraud, 'oppression, and secret licentiousness.' Let us then judge ourselves, that we be not judged of the Lord. Without a contrite and upright heart, God will accept no sacrifice from us: if we allow ourselves in any secret iniquity, or forbidden indulgence; or if we reject the salvation of Christ, our very prayers will become an abomination. Nor can any national regard to the externals of religion avert national judgments, so long as murder and cruel oppression are sanctioned by law, or permitted to be perpetrated with impunity. But, blessed be God, there is a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness, in which the vilest may wash and be made clean. To this sinners of every order in society are directed by the ministers of religion, with most plain and energetic warnings and exhortations. By the grace of the Gospel, the most enslaved sinner may "put away the evil of his doings from before "the eyes of the LORD:" he may be enabled "to cease "to do evil, and may learn to do well:" and may also find pardon and acceptance by faith in Jesus Christ. And when his faith worketh by love of God and man, and he seeks to do judgment, to relieve the oppressed, and to patronize the fatherless and widow, according to his station in society: this change of temper and conduct will prove him interested in all the blessings of a free salvation. Well then may JEHOVAH call upon us to draw near to him, that he may reason with us; for all his dispensations are most righteous and reasonable. But his condescension in allowing us to reason with him, cannot be expressed: for all our conduct and all our objections, are absurd and unreasonable in the extreme. What can be more rational, than every precept of his holy law? What more reasonable than his call to repent and believe his Gospel? If we be willing and obedient, our sins, though of crimson and scarlet hue, will become as snow, or wool; and every blessing will be communicated: but if we continue to refuse and rebel, we must be consumed by his righteous vengeance: "for the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it." 'O Lord, incline every one of our hearts to accept of 'thy mercy, and to live to thy glory.'

V. 21—31.

Could those, who saw the Christian church, in those pure times, when "great grace was upon all" the multitude of believers; and rulers and teachers were distinguished only by their humility, disinterestedness, simplicity, patience, and purity: could they, I say, arise from the dead, and survey the whole of the professing church of Christ; and observe the ambition, magnificence, avarice, luxury, carnal policy, and sloth, of numbers who appear as its rulers and teachers; surely they would exclaim with grief and astonishment, far greater than that of the prophet, "How is the faithful city become an harlot!" "It "was full of judgment, righteousness lodged in it, but "now"—Alas! the silver is generally become dross, and the wine mixed with water, and horrible abuses almost every where prevail. For whilst men are seeking "every "one his gain from his quarter," "loving gifts and following after rewards;" no wonder that piety, justice, and mercy are little attended to. But we must leave the impenitent to the judgment of the Mighty One of Israel, who will certainly "ease him of his adversaries, and "avenge him of his enemies." And whilst we are careful not to be found among them: let us rejoice in the prophetic assurance that he will purely purge his church from all her dross and alloy, and furnish her with rulers and teachers, like the holy apostles and martyrs of old, that she may be called "the City of Righteousness, the "Faithful City." Let us pray for the hastening of those blessed times, when Zion shall be redeemed from her spiritual bondage, by the Lord's righteous judgments on every Anti christian opposer; and enlarged by converts innumerable, interested in the righteousness of Christ, and walking in all holy obedience before him. But believers may expect still more glorious days at the end of the world; at the very time when all transgressors who forsake the Lord shall be confounded and consumed, and shall be ashamed of all those things, which here they desired and rejoiced in; when sinners will become, not only as the withered tree and the parched garden, but even the mightiest of them as tow, and their most splendid performances as fire, and "they shall burn together, and none shall quench them."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 1. This and the two following chapters form one distinct prophecy or message from God to the Jews, which probably was delivered about the close of Uzziah's reign.

V. 2—5. (Mic. iv. 1—5.) The last days, or the latter days, signifies, by the common consent of expositors, without excepting even those of the Jews, the times of the Messiah. (Marg. Ref.) As Solomon's temple, the centre of Israel's worship, was placed upon a mountain, to which the people resorted with their sacrifices from distant places; so the church of Christ and its instituted worship are represented as a temple built upon a mountain. The establishment of his religion, by the abrogation of the Mosaic dispensation, and on the ruins of idolatry; and the advancement of his kingdom above all the kingdoms of the earth, are predicted, by the figure of "the mountain of the LORD's house being established "on the top of the mountains, and exalted above the hills." The calling of the Gentiles, the success of the Gospel in the apostles' days, and that far more extensive propagation of it which is yet to come, are predicted under the image of all nations flowing to this mountain of the Lord's house, as all rivers flow into the ocean. The earnestness of each new convert to bring others with him to the knowledge of Christ and to a life of holiness, is expressed, by the people inviting one another to go up to the house of God to be instructed in his ways. When apostles and evangelists of the Jewish nation went forth to preach the Gospel to the Gentiles, "a law went forth out of Zion, and the word "of God from Jerusalem:" for Christ is a Prince as well as a Saviour, and his word contains precepts to be obeyed as well as truths to be believed. By the establishment of the Gospel, the Lord becomes Judge among the nations, who willingly submit to his authority, and make him the arbiter of their differences: and by his rebukes and convictions, the lessons he teaches, and the grace he bestows, he promotes peace as well as purity. If all men were consistent Christians, there could be no war: as far as Christianity hath prevailed on earth, wars have been conducted with far greater humanity, than before; as far as it prevails in our hearts it disposes us to peace and love; and we may assuredly expect such a general propagation of the Gospel, as will literally fulfil the terms of this prophecy, in the universal prevalence of peace and industry; and then war shall never more be a science and an occupation. (Notes, Rev. xx.) There needs no other proof, that the grand accomplishment of this prophecy is reserved for some future period, than the consideration, that nothing in any measure answerable to such forcible expressions has yet occurred on earth. The prophet closes his prediction by exhorting his people to avail themselves of their advantages, and not to reject the Gospel when preached to them: for these prophecies were intended to instruct future ages.

'This prophecy will not receive its utmost completion, 'till the destruction of the four monarchies, (Dan. ii. 35,) 'and the fulness of Jews and Gentiles are come into the 'church. (Mic. iv.) Yet both these prophecies may be 'partly fulfilled, in the several advances which Christ's 'kingdom makes in the world, who is described as "going "forth conquering and to conquer." (Rev. vi. 1.) 'This 'seems to have been a maxim in interpreting prophecies, 'received among the Jews before Christ's time; that 'wherever they perceived an imperfect completion of pro-'phecy in an historical event, which no way answered the 'lofty expressions and extensive promises, which the na-'tural sense of the text imported; there they supposed the 'times of the Messiah to be ultimately intended, "in whom "all the promises of God are yea, and Amen." 'To pre-'vent any misunderstanding, it may be likewise proper to 'take notice, that this mystical sense of the prophecies is 'now and then, but not so fitly, called a secondary sense; 'not as if it were less principally intended by the prophets; 'but rather with respect to the time, because it is the last 'and ultimate completion of their predictions.' (Lowth.)

—The times of the Messiah are the times from his coming, to the end of the world.

V. 6—9. The Prophet was led from the view of the glorious times which were at length to arrive, to reflect on the state of religion among the Jews in his days. He foresaw that the Lord was about to reject his people, and speaks to Him of it as if already done: and he proceeds to assign the reasons of the divine conduct. He observes that they were "replenished from the east," with idols or idolaters, or necromancers; with vices, luxuries, heathenish fashions, and every thing that could minister to pride and lust. They imitated the Philistines in divination and witchcraft; they abounded with, and took delight in, the children of strangers, whom they employed and imitated; and with whom they contracted marriages, and perhaps even educated their own children after their manner. Whilst the Lord prospered them in their temporal estate; their grand object was by every method to accumulate treasure, and they multiplied chariots and horses contrary to the law. This account of their prosperity accords very well with the reign of Uzziah: (2 Chr. xxvi:) but he did not sanction idolatry. It seems, however, that the land was also full of idols, which the people, in the lower and higher ranks, made and worshipped secretly. In short, their wickedness loudly called for divine judgments; and the prophet says, "Therefore thou wilt not forgive them," as it might more literally be rendered.

V. 10—18. The people were here solemnly warned to prepare for terrible judgments. Let them then hide themselves in those caverns which were found in the rocks, as dismayed by the display of the majesty of God, who was coming to take vengeance on them, and to exalt his own glory and authority by abasing them for their pride, and especially the most exalted and ambitious of them. For that day of his vengeance would peculiarly affect the haughty and the eminent, who were advanced above others, as the stately cedars on the lofty summits of Lebanon, or as the oaks in the forests of Bashan, or as the mountains and hills above the lowly valleys. And whilst all their fortifications were levelled, and all that ministered to their pride and luxury was destroyed, their distinctions would vanish, and they would become sensible of their weakness, guilt, and misery; and by this the Lord would utterly cure them of idolatry. But of what day doth the prophet here speak? It may be accommodated to any of those days, when God ariseth to execute vengeance on guilty nations. The desolations of Judah by the Israelites and Syrians, in the reign of Ahaz; (2 Chr. xxviii;) and the ravages of Sennacherib, might form a prelude to the accomplishment of the prediction: but the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans and the Babylonish captivity seem especially intended, when idolatry was indeed entirely abolished among the Jews. The final destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the rejection and dispersion of the Jewish nation for their opposition to the Gospel, might also be referred to: and our thoughts are naturally led forward to the destruction of all Anti-christian enemies, which will introduce the glorious period before predicted; and to the final consummation of all things, and the solemnities of the day of judgment. 'The prophets 'often take occasion to represent the terrors of the last 'day, from the particular judgments, which should befal 'some one nation.' 'Bochart doth probably guess that 'Tarshish, in its primary signification, was a port in 'Spain, called afterwards Tartessus. But it likewise 'appears, (by comparing 1 Kings xxii. 48. with 2 Chr. 'xx. 36.) that there was a place of the same name near 'Ophir, famous for gold, which Ophir the same learned 'person places in India.' 'Ships of Tarshish signify 'in Scripture any trading or merchant ships: accordingly 'here the Septuagint render the words "ships of the sea," 'as our old English translation does: Ps. xlviii. 7.' (Lowth.) (Note, 1 Kings x. 22.)

V. 19—21. When God should arise to shake terribly the land, and the affrighted inhabitants should seek to hide themselves in caves of the earth, they would throw away their idols, though made of gold and silver, as an encumbrance; and leave them in any deserted corner to the moles and bats, that they might flee for their lives, and escape the vengeance of the Lord.

V. 22. The Jews were prone to place an idolatrous confidence in their heathen neighbours, with whom they made alliances. Thus they relied on the Egyptians, Syrians, and Assyrians, at different times: but they are here called upon to cease from depending on mortal man, who would not be able to help them when in extreme danger. (Note, Ps. cxlvi. 3.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The unwearied efforts of Satan and his servants to exalt heresy and iniquity, and to depress truth and righteousness, may for a time succeed; and then infidels and profligates will triumph: but their joy must be short-lived; for the cause of God shall finally prevail, all the nations of the earth shall flow into the church of Christ, and become his worshippers and servants; and all that hath hitherto been done, is only an earnest of what remains to be performed in due season. But whilst we wait and pray for those glorious days, when the kingdoms of the earth shall become the kingdoms of Jesus; and all their inhabitants, being humbled, and changed by his grace, shall live in equity, truth, and love; cultivate the arts of useful industry; study to be quiet and to do their own business, and learn war no more: let us avail ourselves of the light afforded us, and come and walk in it. Let us remember, that when true religion greatly flourishes, men bestow great diligence, and take much delight in going up to the house of the Lord, and in exciting others to accompany them; they desire and expect that He should teach them his ways, in order that they may walk in them: and they gladly receive his law from mount Zion as their rule of duty, welcome the authority as well as the salvation of the Redeemer, and submit to his rebukes as well as desire his consolations. And let us remember also, that the humble disciple of Christ is, in every age, a harmless and blameless, a benevolent and quiet person, who follows peace and holiness, forbearing and forgiving others, as Christ hath forgiven him: insomuch, that if all were of his temper, wars and furious contentions, public or private, would be annihilated. But whilst we expect more glorious times to the church of God; we cannot but behold with deep regret the present state of the world, and even of the visible church. Alas! we need not wonder that the Lord seems in many places to have forsaken nominal Christians; when we consider to what a degree many parts of the church are replenished with the idolatries, superstitions, vices, luxuries, and ostentatious magnificence of the Gentiles; copy their worst fashions, and form the most unnatural coalitions with the children of strangers. Nay, if we only regard the condition of this protestant land: amidst the splendour and affluence to which we have arrived; have we not "been replenished "from the east," with every species of vice and luxury? Do we not, as a nation, so delight in the children of strangers, that none else can properly prepare our feasts, or our diversions, and administer to our pride or pleasure? And though our land is not full of idols, in the literal sense; yet it is full of idolized riches and possessions: and men are in general so occupied about their gains or indulgences, that the Lord, and his truths, ordinances, and precepts are forgotten, or despised. I will not presume to predict what will be the event as to the land: but assuredly the Lord will not forgive those who persist in abasing themselves by their lusts, and refuse to humble themselves before him.

V. 10—22.

Alas, what can wealth and splendour avail, when the Lord ariseth to take vengeance on guilty nations? His awful dispensations are levelled against those that are haughty and lofty, to bring them low; their pre-eminence and affluence mark them out the most distinguished prey of the rapacious; and they would then gladly compound to redeem their lives with their choicest treasures. But the power and indignation of the Lord are chiefly to be dreaded: and in what secret cavern will men hide themselves from his all-seeing eye? He marks out the proud, as the objects of his jealousy, and hath determined, "that the lofty looks "of men shall be humbled; that He alone may be exalted-"ed," either in the submission or the ruin of every daring rival for honour. And if temporal judgments are often so tremendous, what will be the case at the day of judgment, when the heavens and the earth shall pass away, and no place be found for them? Whither will the sinner then flee to hide himself, "for fear of the Lord, and for the glory "of his majesty?" Then his idolized gold, silver, and costly furniture, will appear as worthless as the mire in the street; and the account to be given of the acquisition and use of them will burden the sinner's heart, and his iniquity committed about them will vastly enhance his condemnation. Happy are they who now flee from the wrath to come, who take shelter in Christ, the Rock of Salvation; who are humbled before God in true repentance, and desire that God alone may be exalted in their hearts, and glorified in showing them mercy; who willingly renounce all worldly interests and carnal connexions, and cease from dependance upon men; that they may give up themselves to the Lord, to serve him in righteousness all their future days. Such persons will have nothing to fear in those terrible seasons, when the wicked shall in vain call upon the rocks to fall upon them, and hide them from the wrath of their offended Judge. Let us then make this our grand concern, and be ready to renounce all for Christ, and to venture or suffer for his sake: and let us cease from expecting help from man, or making any mortal our oracle, our standard, or our confidence; for he is not only fickle, deceitful, and vain, but his breath is in his nostrils, and death will soon deprive him of all his power to help or to harm us. Wherein then is he to be accounted of, that we should, from a desire of his smile, or fear of his frown and reproach, offend the almighty and eternal God, who alone is able to save or to destroy?

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1—9. These verses continue the subject of the preceding chapter, and describe those calamties which would abase the haughty, terrify the daring, and show the folly of idolatry and confidence in men. The gradual approach of the siege and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans is principally foretold; and the history of that event, with the Prophecy and Lamentations of Jeremiah, form the best comment upon it: but that destruction itself was a sort of type of the final destruction of the city by the Romans. The prophet calls upon all men to behold and observe, for "the Lord," their Governor, "even JEHOVAH of hosts," or armies, was about to deprive Jerusalem and Judah of every stay and support; as well as to reduce them to extremities for want of bread and water. He would speedily cause to cease from among them able commanders and valiant soldiers, active magistrates, faithful teachers and prophets, prudent and experienced counsellors, honourable rulers, expert artificers, or builders, who might have fortified the city, and eloquent orators who might have influenced the people to unite for their own defence; and their very princes should be mere children in years and want of experience. This was fulfilled after the death of Josiah, by the succession of his sons and grandson in their early youth, and by their foolish and infatuated counsels. During those feeble reigns, the people had license to oppress each other, and all distinctions in society seemed to be abolished; so that children, and the vilest of the people, treated the most ancient and honourable with insolence and contempt. In such circumstances, offices of trust and honour must become so burdensome, that none would be willing to fill them: whilst every one would see the necessity of some exerting themselves to repress internal distractions, and to provide for the public security. Yet the people would be so impoverished, that very few could bear the expense of the magistracy: so that, if any one was decently clothed, that would be deemed a considerable qualification for authority: and his brethren would be ready to lay hold of him, and almost to constrain him to be a ruler, and to endeavour to repair the ruined state of the community. But every one would protest against so desperate an undertaking; and be ready to make oath, that he was not in circumstances for such a charge, having neither bread nor clothing at home adequate to the expense. Or, every one would be so concerned for his present ease, and so anxious to shift for his own safety, that no one would trouble himself about the public. For, in fact, the city and land would be ruined and desolated: because their words and works had been so daringly rebellious against the Lord, and even before his glorious eyes, in his holy city and at his temple, as if they had determined to provoke him to wrath. Nay, their proud and insolent looks, and avowed purposes of wickedness, rendered them like the abominable inhabitants of Sodom; so that they had merited the severest vengeance, and had brought their calamities upon their own head. 'It is customary, through all 'the east, to gather together an immense quantity of 'furniture and clothes; for their fashions never alter: 'and princes and great men are obliged to have a great 'stock of such things in readiness, for presents upon all 'occasions.' (1 Kings iv. 22, 23. Neh. v. 17, 18.) (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 10, 11. There were a few pious persons among the Jews, even in the worst of times; and though the prophets did not effect a national reformation to prevent public calamities, they doubtless were instrumental in bringing many individuals to repentance. It was, therefore, proper that such persons should be encouraged; and they were assured, that notwithstanding national crimes and judgments, every upright believer would be graciously accepted and recompensed, and have the comfort and benefit of his righteousness; whilst the wo denounced upon the wicked was taking effect, and they were receiving the reward of their crimes.

V. 12—15. It was time for the Lord to interpose; for even children and women ruled over his people; (either weak and effeminate persons; or bad women, by their influence with those that administered public affairs;) nay, their teachers led them astray, and by their false doctrines and opposition to the true prophets, they obstructed and spoiled the way in which men ought to have walked. The Lord was therefore determined to stand up and plead his own cause, and to enter into judgment with the people; especially with their elders and princes, who were notorious for robbery and oppression. For what could they mean, who ought to have been the support of justice, and the guardians of the poor, to enslave, and cruelly to beat, and almost to starve them; so that their very countenances showed how they were crushed, and almost ground to powder by their exactions? 'The words, (translated "children are their oppressors,") 'may be rendered their oppressors glean them; i. e. take from them the poor remainder of their substance, which the former calamities had left. The word is used Deut. xxiv. 21.' "For "they that lead thee," the margin reads, they that call thee blessed; i. e. the false prophets, who soothe thee in thy sins, and foretel nothing but peace and prosperity.' (Lowth.)

V. 16, 17. The prophet next reproved the women of Jerusalem, especially those in superior stations. It might indeed have been expected that the daughters of Zion would be sober, decent, and modest in their attire, and adorned with holiness: but they resembled the wanton courtezan, instead of imitating those holy women of old who trusted in God. They walked with stretched-forth necks, to show themselves, to gaze, and to be gazed on; and with wanton eyes, set off with artificial painting of the eye-lids, inviting the beholders to accost them. Pride and affected delicacy were shown in all their motions; whilst, after the fashion of their heathen neighbours, they wore little bells in their shoes, the tinkling of which announced their approach. But the Lord was determined to disgrace and expose them for this their vanity and wantonness: some loathsome disease should be sent to spoil their comeliness; and being taken captive, stript, and sold for slaves, they should experience the most shocking and distressing treatment from their inhuman conquerors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 18—26. The prophet here proceeds to enumerate the various ornaments in which his country-women prided themselves, but of which they would shortly be deprived. It is not necessary to attempt the explanation of the terms, and indeed little satisfactory can be advanced on many articles of this very singular inventory; and nothing interesting, without a disproportionate degree of labour, in a matter merely of curiosity. The fashions of those ages doubtless varied much from those of our times: but human nature was the same. The Lord was so displeased with the pride and ostentation of the females, that he joined it with the impiety and oppression of the princes, as a reason for his judgments on the land: and he declared that he would so punish them, that a loathsome smell, through disease and squalid neglect, should be substituted in the place of their costly perfumes; rent and tattered garments instead of their beautiful girdles; sackcloth instead of their fine linen; and a skin scorched and even blistered by the burning sun, instead of that beauty of which they were so vain: for the forces of the Jews being utterly vanquished, Jerusalem would be levelled with the ground; which event is represented under the idea of a desolate female seated upon the earth. 'Jerusalem is here 'described as a woman bereaved of her children, and la-'menting over them in this melancholy posture. And 'thus she was represented in a medal coined by Vespa-'sian's order, after the destruction of that city by the Ro-'mans.' (Lowth.) The prophet, indeed, more immediately foretels the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans: but the representation would equally suit either catastrophe. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

If men do not stay themselves on God, he will soon remove from them all other supports; and, as the body soon languishes and dies, from which the staff of bread and the stay of water are utterly withheld; so the soul, that hath not learned to trust in God, must fall into entire misery when separated from its worldly pleasures and possessions. It is vain for nations to rely on able statesmen and chieftains; on valiant soldiers, prudent counsellors, or eloquent orators; for, when the Lord pleases, he taketh away their breath, and they die, in the very crisis when their aid is wanted; or, if they live, their wisdom, courage, or success may vanish at once, and disappoint every expectation formed of them. And what benefit can individuals or communities expect from prophets, or teachers, whose admonitions they neglect; or from those false prophets, "who speak peace when there is no peace?" The Lord hath various ways of punishing obstinate transgressors: he gives up offending nations to foolish and feeble governors, and to distracted counsels; he leaves men to their vile passions, to oppress and punish each other; and he corrects those in authority who despise him, by means of the insolence of their juniors and inferiors. In times of calamity, when little can be expected in exalted stations, except trouble and expense, men generally decline them, even though there be a prospect of doing good. For most are aware that rulers should be healers, and should aim to compose distractions and promote the public good: yet few seek and use authority for these purposes; or choose to sacrifice personal interest to genuine benevolence. However, though one nation, city, or company of professed Christians after another be ruined; yet we have a Ruler, who is also our Brother, that hath unsearchable riches and almighty power, and immeasurable love: he is indeed a Healer, and hath undertaken our ruined cause, and given himself a ransom for our souls; in his hand we are safe, and his true church and every believer will certainly obtain complete deliverance. But profession and external advantages will only aggravate the crimes of those who sin, as in God's more immediate presence, and provoke the eyes of his glory by their wicked words and actions. And men should remember, that their impudence and insolence in wickedness, and their daring looks, whilst they declare their sin as Sodom, will testify against them, and prove that they have rewarded evil to themselves; when the Lord shall denounce and execute vengeance upon them. But blessed be God, there is abundant encouragement to the righteous to trust him, and for sinners to repent and return to him. However his providential dispensations may vary, he will invariably bless his people, who shall reap the fruit of their faith and piety: and he will punish his impenitent enemies according to their works.

V. 12—26.

Our righteous Lord hath always good reasons for his severest judgments, as will be made manifest in due time. Rulers, nobles, and teachers also, not unfrequently, are ring-leaders in ungodliness, and the great promoters of wickedness in church and state: and when authority falls into bad hands, and the instructors of the people are blind guides, who oppose and pervert the right ways of the Lord, it may be expected that he will stand up to execute judgment. But he knoweth how to distinguish betwixt the righteous and the wicked, the tempted and the tempters, and the different degrees of guilt in men's conduct: he will judge impartially, as well as punish severely; and he will call men to a strict account for all their wealth and power, and the use which they made of them. Many, indeed, who eat up the vineyard of the poor, and embellish their splendid palaces with ill-gotten goods, elude human justice. But what do professed Christians mean, to beat and persecute God's people, and oppress and grind the faces of the poor? Do they indeed intend to bring on themselves the fierce wrath of the Lord, who is the Patron and Advocate of the afflicted and oppressed?—Nor let it be thought that the Lord disregards the conduct of those females, who are chiefly remarkable for their vanity and dissipation. He watches over, and registers, all their thoughts and words, and every wanton look; and all their affected and ostentatious delicacy, the expression of their pride and self-admiration. Especially he notes with abhorrence such wantonness and haughtiness in the daughters of Zion, in women professing the Gospel. He does not deem these indifferent or trivial matters; but, as it were, keeps an inventory of all their ornaments; and by his prophets and servants, protests against that fondness for external show, and that desire of being admired and flattered, and of becoming temptations to others, which are the sources of this vanity. The profuse expense also of precious time and of money, to the neglect of piety, charity, and even justice; to the ruin of families, and the subversion of all distinction of rank in society, meet his most decided disapprobation. The occasion, which such vanities afford for temptations to still further crimes, in order to support the expense of them; the violation of his holy day that it occasions, and the abominable practice of coming to places of worship, as to a theatre, in which to exhibit their vain decorations; whilst those, who should be worshipping, or hearing the word of God, are employed in admiring, envying, or making remarks on their finery: all these, and innumerable more evils arise from this contagious folly, which is too generally tolerated in our congregations; but which will eventually eat out the life of godliness, where not opposed and protested against, as inconsistent with the word of God. Without all doubt, the more care people take to have their souls beautified with salvation, and to do good to their poor brethren, the less time and money will they waste in this manner. And if indeed Christians are bound to redeem their time, improve their talents, refuse conformity to the world, and do all things to the glory of God; surely some regard should be paid to the scriptural examples and exhortations on this subject: (Marg. Ref.) And women professing godliness should be an entire contrast to those wanton daughters of Zion, in their deportment and apparel. If they will despise or be offended by admonitions of this kind, perhaps the Lord may in this world visit them with such disease, poverty, and calamity, as may convince them of their sin and folly. Death, however, will soon strip the poor body of all its ornaments, and bereave it of all its comeliness: then, indeed, there will be stink instead of a perfume; and all that taste and elegance, which have been for a moment admired, will be changed for the cold grave, for putrefaction, and for the consuming worm. And what will such ornaments and distinctions avail at the resurrection and the day of judgment: when every one, without respect of rank or sex, must give an account of the things done in the body, whether good or evil? May every reader henceforth renounce such childish vanities, and seek that beauty and that adorning, which will endure, brighten, and purify for ever; which, at the hour of death, will render the soul meet for the company of holy angels; and will ensure to the body a glorious resurrection, in the image and likeness of our exalted Redeemer, to be with him for ever in his heavenly kingdom.

NOTES.

CHAP. IV. V. 1. This verse should not have been separated from the preceding chapter, as it evidently relates to the same subject. When Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, and after it was taken, (for those times seem to be intended,) the men were generally destroyed, (iii. 25;) but the women survived in very disproportionate numbers, and had little prospect of being married: and, as the unmarried state was generally deemed reproachful among the Jews, it is foretold that in those circumstances they would disregard the ordinary rules of decorum, and many of them together importunately solicit the same man to take them in marriage, that they might bear his name and be exempted from their reproach; and that the expense might not be an objection, they would undertake to maintain themselves. All this is so contrary to female modesty, and the natural aversion which women feel to share a husband's affections with several rivals; that it strongly marks both the peculiarity of their circumstances, and the impropriety of their deportment. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2. The Lord did not intend to destroy either the family of David, or the seed of Israel; but that they should again shoot forth and prosper. Either Zerubbabel of David's line, or Jeshua of Aaron's line, might be called "the "branch of the LORD;" and the plenty produced by the land for the returning Jews may be referred to: but these can only be as types and feeble shadows; for the expressions are so peculiar, that they must be applied to the Messiah, and the Christian dispensation. He is repeatedly called "the Branch," and this Branch of the Lord is altogether beautiful and glorious, his human nature is the most excellent and comely production of the earth; or, "the fruit of "the earth," may mean, the blessed fruits of his mediation, which belong to the remnant of true believers. (Marg. Ref.) Yet not only the establishment of his kingdom in the times of the apostles; but its enlargement also, by the gathering of the dispersed Jews into the church, seem here predicted. Then they will see, that the Branch that they despised, is indeed beautiful and glorious; and his fruit, that they neglected, indeed excellent and comely for them. We shall have frequent opportunities of showing that the prophets use the expression "In that day," with a latitude thus large; for "with the Lord a thousand years are but "as one day." "In that day," often denotes in Isaiah, 'not the same time with that which is last mentioned, but 'an extraordinary season remarkable for some signal 'events of Providence:—just as in that day denotes the 'day of judgment, in the New Testament.' (2 Thes. i. 10. 2 Tim. i. 12. 18.—iv. 8.) 'Grotius acknow-'ledges, (in his notes on xiv. 21.) that it is usual for the 'prophets to pass from the threatenings that relate to their 'own times, to the promises which belong to the times 'of the Gospel.' 'This may be partly understood of 'those that were converted by the preaching of Christ 'and his apostles, and thereby escaped the vengeance 'which involved the rest of the nation. (Acts ii. 40. 1 Thes. 'ii. 16.;) but I apprehend it is chiefly meant of those 'Jews which shall be converted at the end of the world, '(when the obstinate and incorrigible shall be destroyed,) 'and shall return home from their several dispersions.' (Marg. Ref.) 'The words plainly point at the conver-'sion of the Jews in the latter times of the world, and the 'flourishing state of the church, which should follow it.' (Lowth.)

CHAP. V.

A parable of a well cultivated vineyard which bare corrupt fruit; explained of the conduct of Israel, 1—7. Their atrocious sins, and the correspondent judgments that were coming on them, 8—25. The invasion of the land by the Assyrians or Chaldeans, 26—30.

NOW [a] will I sing to my [b] Well-beloved a song of my Beloved [c] touching his vineyard. My Well-beloved hath a vineyard in a * very fruitful hill:

V. 3, 4. The Jews relapsed no more into idolatry after the captivity, and they were greatly reformed, and had much true religion among them. The daughters of Zion also, who had thought themselves very delicate when the Lord saw them to be very filthy, were purified by the captivity: and the innocent blood that had been shed was purged out of Jerusalem by those desolating judgments. Yet this was only a shadow of more glorious blessings. That remnant, according to the election of grace, which forms the true church, is an holy people, and they are written or enrolled as the living citizens of Jerusalem, 'whose names 'are written in the book of life, among God's elect, to 'whom the promises to God's people peculiarly belong. 'The phrase alludes to the registers which were kept of 'the Jewish families.' (Lowth.) The Jews who embraced the Gospel, in the apostles' days, were, and the descendants of that nation who shall hereafter be restored to their place in the church, shall be, washed from the guilt and pollution of their sins; and especially from their blood-guiltiness in murdering the prophets, and in crucifying the Lord of glory. And this effect is produced, not so much by outward calamities, as by the Holy Ghost, "as a Spirit of "judgment, and a Spirit of burning;" that is, as convincing and humbling the sinner, leading him to judge and condemn himself, and to hate and oppose his sins, and thus, like purifying fire, consuming the dross, and transforming the soul into his own holy likeness.

V. 5, 6. The pillar of cloud and fire was Israel's protection, guide, and honour, in passing through the wilderness; and it is here predicted, that God would equally take care of all the habitations of his people, as well as all their assemblies for public worship. When he puts his glory on them, he places them under his special protection; as the splendid curtains of the tabernacle were covered by those of goats' hair, and those of badgers' skins. (Marg. Ref.) Thus he defends them from temptation and persecution, and from all perils in life and death. As this is a prophecy of the church at large, it will hereafter receive its full accomplishment.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It frequently happens, that such as suffer for their sins, are more careful to avoid outward inconveniences than to obtain forgiveness: and instead of being ashamed of their crimes, are more solicitous to avoid the reproach which arises from unavoidable misfortune, than the infamy which results from voluntary and open wickedness. But such conduct tends to indelible disgrace and increasing misery. The Lord will not contend for ever with his church: and though it seem cut down as a tree, it will shoot forth again, and its branches shall be beautiful and glorious: yet all its excellency is derived from "the Branch of the LORD," "the Only-begotten of the Father, who is full of grace "and truth," and is the perfection of beauty and glory: and the fruits of his incarnation and mediation are inexpressibly excellent and desirable, in the judgment of all those who have begun to experience deliverance from wrath, and from the power of Satan. These are the citizens of Zion, whose names are registered in the book of life; and every one of them partakes of the Spirit of Christ, and is daily renewed into his holy image; they wash away all their guilt and pollution, in the fountain that he hath opened; every affliction serves as a furnace to purify them from their dross; and the efficacious influences of the Holy Ghost, (with which they are baptized as with fire) gradually extirpate their lusts, invigorate their spiritual affections, and render them holy as he is holy. In proportion as the Lord thus sanctifies believers, or any part of his professing church, he will vouchsafe them the tokens of his favour and the comforts of his presence, in their habitations and in their assemblies; and he will assure them of his guidance and protection, through the perils of the wilderness, "as the light of a flaming fire by night, and "as a tabernacle for a shadow from the heat by day." For if we be made glorious by the renewal of his image on our souls, "on all this glory shall be a defence," during the trials of life, in the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. Let us then seek earnestly to be washed from sin and made holy; and then we must be safe and happy. Let us assure ourselves that the Lord will take care of his own cause, in all possible emergencies: let us seek his presence in our families, and his protection of our habitations, by constantly worshipping him in them; and his blessing upon our assemblies, that his ordinances may be honourable and useful: and let us anticipate with joy those blessed times, when the purity, extent, peace, glory, and security of the church will fully explain the import of these predictions.

NOTES.

CHAP. V. V. 1. This chapter contains a detached prophecy, which probably was delivered about the same time with that in the preceding chapters. It begins with

2 And [d] he * fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and [e] planted it with the choicest vine, [f] and built a tower in the midst of it, and also † made [g] a wine-press therein: and [h] he looked that it should bring forth grapes, and it brought forth [i] wild grapes.

3 And now, O inhabitants of Jerusalem, and men of Judah, [k] judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard.

4 What [l] could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes?

5 And now, [m] go to; I will tell you what I will do to my vineyard: [n] I will take away the hedge thereof, and it shall be eaten up; and break down the wall thereof, and it shall be ‡ trodden down:

6 And [o] I will lay it waste: [p] it shall not be pruned, nor digged; but there shall come up briers and thorns: [q] I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it.

a parable formed into a sacred song, which the prophet proposed to sing to his "Well-beloved." JEHOVAH is the owner of the vineyard: but the Father revealeth himself by his only begotten Son, who is both the Well-beloved of the Father, and of every believer. The original word for my Beloved occurs more frequently in Solomon's song, than in all other parts of the Bible, at least in this meaning and connexion. (Marg. Ref.) Some render the first clause, "Now will I sing to my Beloved a song of loves touching "his vineyard." No doubt, however, Christ is meant, whether the prophet be supposed to speak in his own name to the Messiah; or the Father by him thus to address his well-beloved Son. He had "a vineyard in a very fruitful "hill:" or "in the horn, the son of oil," as it is in the original. The situation of the land of Canaan, being very high is represented by a horn, which is higher than any other part of the animal: and the son of oil, is a Hebraism denoting fertility; oil-olive being one of the most valued productions of the promised land. But the peculiar religious privileges of the Israelites may be intended under this emblem, as well as the situation and fertility of Canaan.

V. 2. The care of the Lord over Israel is here described, by expressions taken from the management of a vineyard. (Marg. Ref.) When he separated that nation from the heathen, made a national covenant with them, gave them laws and ordinances, and took them under his own special protection and government, "he fenced his "vineyard:" the destruction of the Canaanites and their idolatrous worship, was "the gathering out of the stones," which would have injured the vines. His care in forming this church of the descendants of faithful Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and in reforming the nation under Moses, Aaron, and Joshua, before their entrance into the promised land, was represented by his planting the vineyard with the choicest vine, (or the vine of Sorek.) The temple, with its altar and worship, is intended by "the tower," in which the husbandman might safely lodge to watch, and be ready to tend, the vineyard. The stated ministry of the priests and Levites, the occasional ministry of the prophets, and all the means of grace, are denoted, by the wine-press or vat, into which the juice of the grapes was to run. But after all this preparation, the vineyard, instead of producing abundance of good grapes, as might have been expected, yielded only wild grapes, or nauseous poisonous berries with some resemblance of grapes; that is, hypocrisy and impiety, instead of righteousness and true holiness. (Notes, Deut. xxxii. 32, 33. 2 Kings iv. 39.)

V. 3, 4. Perhaps the Jews murmured at the judgments denounced against them; but the Lord here offered to make them judges in his controversy with his vineyard, as a judge, before he passes sentence, asks the criminal, what he can urge why he should not be condemned? With the manifold advantages, and encouragements to holiness that they enjoyed, and the promises of special assistance contained in their scriptures, they ought to have been a peculiar people zealous of good works: nor could they mention any thing, which ought to be done for them, that God had not done, or was not ready to do, whenever they asked him. So that they could assign no reason for their wickedness, but the desperate depravity of their own hearts. 'From this, among many other texts of Scrip-'ture, we may conclude, that those may have sufficient 'means of grace afforded them, who nevertheless are not 'actually or effectually converted.' (Lowth.) This is clear and satisfactory; but the sufficient grace, which yet proves insufficient, is not very intelligible. Sufficient means leave no insurmountable obstacle, were the heart properly disposed: but sufficient grace properly disposes it. Neither of these, however, can be to a sinner a matter of debt, but wholly of grace. "What was there more to be done "to," &c. This seems the literal translation: not that God had done all that was in his power, and so was disappointed when he failed of success: but that he had done all that was proper, or could reasonably have been expected.

V. 5, 6. The Lord next passed sentence on the vineyard, and informed the people what he meant to do with it. He would withdraw his protection; give up the land, city, and temple to be ravaged by their enemies; deprive them of the means of grace, and leave many of them to mingle with the heathen: nay, he would "command the "clouds to rain no rain upon them;" he would awfully withhold the sanctifying influences of his Spirit. This was, in part and for a time, fulfilled during the Babylonish captivity; but far more exactly in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, their exclusion from the church; their long-continued dispersion without priest or prophet, and without heavenly influences on any means of grace to render them effectual. (Note, Hos. iv. 4, 5.)

7 For [r] the vineyard of the LORD of hosts is the house of Israel, and the men of Judah * his pleasant plant: and [s] he looked for judgment, but behold † oppression; for righteousness, but [t] behold a cry.

8 ¶ Woe unto [u] them that join house to house, that lay [x] field to field, till there be no place, that ‡ they may be [y] placed alone in the midst of the earth!

9 § In mine ears said the LORD of hosts, ‖ Of a truth many houses shall be [z] desolate, even great and fair, without inhabitant.

10 Yea, ten acres of vineyard shall yield [a] one bath, and the seed of an homer shall yield an ephah.

11 ¶ Woe unto them that [b] rise up early in the morning, that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night, till wine * inflame them!

12 And [c] the harp, and the viol, the tabret, and pipe, and wine are in their feasts: but [d] they regard not the work of the LORD, neither consider the operation of his hands.

13 Therefore [e] my people are gone into captivity, [f] because they have no knowledge: and † their honourable men are famished, and [g] their multitude dried up with thirst.

14 Therefore [h] hell hath enlarged herself, and [i] opened her mouth without measure: and their glory, and their multitude, and their pomp, and [k] he that rejoiceth, shall descend into it.

15 And [l] the mean man shall be brought down, and the mighty man shall be humbled, and [m] the eyes of the lofty shall be humbled:

16 But [n] the LORD of hosts shall be exalted in judgment, and ‡ God that is holy shall be [o] sanctified in righteousness.

17 Then [p] shall the lambs feed after their manner, and [q] the waste places of the fat ones shall [r] strangers eat.

V. 7. The parable related to the whole people of Israel, but especially to Judah, who had been peculiarly favoured and delighted in: but the Jews were so degenerated from the piety of their ancestors, that instead of judgment and righteousness, the land was full of oppression and the cries of the oppressed. 'The living members of the church 'are called "the branch of God's planting." (lxi. 3.) 'The Jews should have been such.' (Lowth.)

V. 8—10. The prophet next declared, in plain language, that the vengeance of God was coming on the Jews for their various transgressions: but he so expressed himself, that he included with them all persons, of every age and nation, who are guilty of the same crimes. He first denounced a wo upon the avaricious and rapacious, who were intent by every means on increasing their estates; caring not who was turned destitute, provided they could add house to house and field to field; that they might be placed alone in the midst of the land, as sole proprietors, attended only by their vassals and dependents. But the Lord had told the prophet in his ears, privately; that ere long many of their magnificent houses would be left uninhabited; and that their estates should be almost wholly unproductive, so that ten acres of vineyard should only produce a few gallons of wine, and their corn-fields yield one tenth of the seed generally sown upon them: that is, the land would be desolated, and their estates would become of no value. (Note, Lev. xxvii. 16.) A bath, in liquids, and an ephah in solids, were measures of equal size; and the tenth part of a homer, which contained a hundred omers.

V. 11—17. The next wo is denounced against the dissolute and intemperate, who were so intent upon their excesses, that they rose early to begin them, and continued till night, inflaming their passions with wine. They likewise employed all kinds of music to render their pleasures more exquisite; but God and his works were not in all their thoughts; they only regarded second causes, in their prosperity; and they despised the predictions of wrath, as well as the promises of mercy, which he sent them by his prophets, as if He were unable to accomplish either the one or the other. The prophet therefore speaks of the approaching judgments, as if already come: the people were gone into captivity for their wilful ignorance and folly; the nobles were dying with hunger, the common people with thirst; nay, hell, (either the grave, or the place of torment, to which the souls of such men must descend,) is introduced as a voracious monster, opening wide his insatiable jaws, and gorging his prey without measure; whilst all their glory, and multitude, and pomp, with the most jovial and sensual of them, would at once be swallowed up by it. Thus even the meanest would be brought still lower; and the mightiest abased and humbled, as to their condition and lofty looks; and God alone would be exalted and glorified, in the righteous judgments that he executed, and be adored and magnified for that display of his holiness and justice. Then the whole land would be either left to be occupied by the cattle alone; or be devoured by strangers, who would seize upon the waste places where lately the wealthy Jews inhabited. Some expositors suppose, that by lambs are meant the poor, in-offensive, and humble believers among them; who were rescued from oppression and provided for, when their wealthy oppressors were utterly ruined. 'Good men shall 'want nothing that is necessary for their support. God 'is often represented as a Shepherd, and his care of the 'righteous described by their feeding securely in rich pas'tures.' (lxv. 10. Ps. xxiii. 1.)' (Lowth.)

V. 18, 19. The figurative expressions, used in describing those on whom the next wo is denounced, are differently interpreted: "They draw iniquity with cords of "vanity, and sin as it were with a cart-rope:" that is, say some, they labour in effecting their wicked designs, as the cattle do, that draw loaded waggons by ropes or traces; whilst they only obtain vanity, and draw down vengeance upon themselves. Others suppose an illusion to the making of ropes, which are industriously spun out to a great length, and then made strong by twisting many threads together. Thus men proceed from one kind and degree of wickedness to another; lengthening out and multiplying their crimes; connecting one with another, and causing one to spring out of another, and strengthening the whole by wicked confederacies and infidel principles, as if their object were to become as wicked as possible. In plain language, they are persons, who defy the predicted vengeance of God, and avow their resolution not to believe a word of it, till it be executed; and therefore if He, whom in contempt they call "the Holy One of Israel," mean to convince them, "let him make speed, and hasten his "work, that they may see and know it." 'An evil in'clination is as the beginning of a fine hair-string; but at 'the finishing like a thick cart-rope.' (Kimchi from the Rabbins.) 'By a long progression in iniquity, men arrive 'at length at the highest degree of wickedness; bidding 'open defiance to God, and scoffing at his threatened 'judgments, as it is finely expressed in the next verse.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 20. The daring impiety of some Jews was supported by principles equally corrupt. They employed sophistical reasonings to confound the distinctions betwixt good and evil, truth and falsehood; and perverted language to give actions false names. Thus, avarice is often termed prudence, and licentiousness liberality; and rebellion, impiety, and revenge, are considered proofs of a noble spirit; whilst piety and conscientiousness are called enthusiasm, hypocrisy, preciseness, and affectation. Thus men often speak, as if it were of no consequence what doctrines they believed; or as if the conjectures of presumptuous reasoners were equally worthy of regard with the authenticated testimony of God; as if ignorance in divine things were of no bad consequence, and knowledge in them of no value; or as if those theories which contradict the Scriptures were the effect of peculiar illumination; and that which corresponds with them ignorance and darkness; and as if sweetness were only to be found in the bitter ways of ungodliness, and nothing but bitterness could be found in obedience to God's commandments. They who commend wicked men, wicked works, antiscriptural principles, and a worldly life, and run down truth, holiness, and pious persons in this manner, evidently act from the corrupt relish of a carnal heart, and from the state of their own souls; and because they want an excuse for their own conduct, and a quietus to their consciences.

V. 21. They who prefer their own reasonings to divine revelation, and their own devices to the admonitions and commands of God; who deem it prudent and politic to retain lucrative sins, and to neglect self-denying duties; who despise or reject the mysteries of the Gospel, and deride those who believe and preach them; or who are vain of their formal knowledge of them, and do not reduce them to practice, are evidently "wise in their own eyes, and "prudent in their own sight." 'They think themselves 'too wise to need any instruction, and therefore despise 'the admonitions of God's prophets.' (Lowth.)

V. 22, 23. Some it seems, even among the rulers and magistrates in Judah, shamefully prided themselves in being able to drink much strong liquor without being inebriated, and in mingling wine with intoxicating ingredients: but the wrath of God is here denounced against them. To defray the expenses of intemperance, as well as to gratify avarice, they took bribes to pervert justice, to clear the guilty, and to condemn the righteous; thus depriving him of the benefit of his righteousness, and treating him as a criminal.

† Or, distress.——‡ Or, when it is light it shall be dark in the destructions thereof.

V. 24, 25. On account of all these enormous crimes, God denounced most terrible vengeance against his people, which would consume them as fire doth the stubble and chaff: and waste them as the blossom withers and vanishes, when the root of the plant is become rottenness; alluding to the simile of a pleasant plant. The first calamities by the Syrians and Israelites, in the reign of Ahaz, may be here intended, which were so terrible, that the hills trembled; as perhaps they were attended by earthquakes. 'The 'mountains and the earth itself are often said to tremble 'at God's judgments; which expressions allude to the 'trembling of mount Sinai, when God came down upon 'it.' (Marg. Ref.) 'And because these particular judg-'ments are an earnest of the general judgment, when the 'whole frame of the world shall be dissolved.' (Lowth.) The terrible attendants and effects, however, of these judgments, failed of bringing the people to repentance; and indeed they were insufficient to appease the righteous indignation of God: insomuch, that he predicted still further and more dreadful vengeance, in that remarkable, and often repeated, clause, "For all this his anger is not turned "away, but his hand is stretched out still."

V. 26—30. This animated description seems to predict the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, rather than that of Sennacherib. When the Lord lifted up his ensign, or gave the signal, as by a hiss or whistling sound, the executioners of his vengeance would come with inconceivable celerity from the most distant countries; being eager for the expedition, and being prospered by God himself, they would meet with nothing to retard them, and would lose no time through indolence or weariness. Being fully armed for the battle, their horses' hoofs, (which were not then shod with iron as with us,) should be preserved, as if made of flint, and their chariots should run with the rapidity of a whirlwind; their rage and boldness would resemble those of lions, young or old, or lionesses, and they would meet with no effectual resistance when they came to seize upon their prey. In short, they would be as terrible to the Jews, as the roaring of the sea to the shipwrecked mariner, who looking towards the land can see no way of escape, and who is surrounded with despair and sorrow; for every beam of hope and comfort would be enveloped in utter darkness, as the heavens are sometimes wholly covered with black and gloomy clouds.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

Whilst they, who truly love our God and Saviour, endeavour by every proper means to do good, they primarily seek his glory; and they discern and adore his justice in those dispensations, which disgrace and afflict those with whom they are most intimately connected. Such as are favoured with the word and ordinances of God and the encouragements of his Gospel, stand in a peculiar relation to him. The tendency of these advantages is to render them fruitful in good works: this the Lord requires of them, and nothing else will satisfy him; and when they only bear the wild grapes of hypocrisy, impiety, and iniquity, they are nigh unto destruction. Indeed the case is so plain, that if the fact were so stated in a parable that self-love could be precluded, sinners must be induced to give judgment against themselves: and at the day of judgment, when sentence shall be given upon all the workers of iniquity, the criminals will universally perceive that it is in vain to attempt to justify their conduct. Those excuses, by which many now quiet their consciences, will then appear futile and desperate; as they charge the blame of man's wickedness on God, and vindicate all the crimes that can possibly be committed. But as all things pertaining to life and godliness are proposed to us by the Gospel, and we are commanded to ask what we will that it may be given to us; the sinner's persevering wickedness will be found to arise from his enmity to God, aversion to his service, and contempt of spiritual blessings; and it will appear that he would on no account consent to the mortification of his lusts by the special grace of God. So that it may with propriety be inquired, What more could have been done for these men, that has not been done for them? Indeed the Lord is not bound to afford his rebellious creatures so many advantages: but if He graciously vouchsafe them, and men will rebel against the light, or take encouragement to sin from the truths of the Gospel, their guilt will be peculiarly aggravated, and they may expect to be doomed to everlasting unholiness and misery. (Mark xi. 14. 21. Rev. xxii. 11.) Nations or churches also, who abuse their privileges, may expect to be deprived of them: the Lord will "take away the hedge" of his unfruitful vineyard, "and it shall be eaten up." "He will lay it "waste that it shall not be pruned or digged; there shall "come up briers and thorns, and he will even command "the clouds that they rain no rain upon it." Whatever delight he hath taken in any company of Christians; if they or their posterity degenerate from that faith and purity which once distinguished them, and become addicted to covetousness, oppression, or any vice: we may shortly expect to hear woes denounced against them, or judgments executed upon them. Few, if any, of the descriptions of professed Christians in our land, are unconcerned in this observation: may we all be zealous and repent, and do our first works, that the awful sentence may not be awarded against us.

V. 8—30.

Men are commonly deemed happy, who grow rich with rapidity, and add one possession to another, as if they would appropriate the whole earth. But covetousness is idolatry; and it is generally attended by fraud and oppression of the poor, which God abhors; and whilst many envy the prosperous wretch, the Lord denounces an awful wo upon him. Providence may, perhaps, deprive him of his wealth or render it a burden to him: God, however, will speedily require his soul, and then whose will all his riches be? Nor are the luxurious and intemperate less obnoxious to divine vengeance: how many are there who inflame themselves with excessive indulgence, and gratify every sense, as if their only business on earth were to pamper the body, and there were no other use to be made of their time and substance! Such men regard not the works of the Lord, nor consider the operation of his hands: the wonders of creation, providence, and redemption, are alike unnoticed by them; nay, they observe not his terrible judgments, and expect not his threatened vengeance. The prevalence of such impiety and vice brings desolating judgments on kingdoms, which reduce all ranks to the most abject misery: and no tongue can express what numbers, both of the honourable from their pompous feasts, and of the mean from their licentious revels, descend into hell, "which enlargeth herself, and openeth her mouth "without measure," to swallow up the multitudes that continually become her prey. In that dreadful place there will not be so much as a drop of water to cool the burning tongue of those, who here fared sumptuously every day. But whilst the impious profligates are abased to the lowest misery and contempt, "the Lord of Hosts will be exalted "in judgment, and God that is holy will be sanctified "in righteousness." In every case he will also provide for the meek and humble, and feed both the bodies and souls of his people. But it is lamentable to observe what pains men bestow in pursuing the vanities of the world, and in gratifying their lusts, and in drawing down the judgments of God upon them: and what prodigious excesses of impiety and iniquity men gradually arrive at. Every sin needs some other to conceal it, to secure the success of it, or to defray its expense. Youthful lusts lead to depredation, lying, perjury, perhaps to murder; corrupt practices lead to infidel principles; and thus men sin away fear, shame, and remorse, till they set God at defiance by their blasphemies: and they can only be convinced of the truth of his word, by his hastening his threatened vengeance; and then too late they will know it, and become sensible of their own madness and folly. In the mean time, they continue to "call good evil, and evil good, to put "darkness for light, and light for darkness, and bitter for "sweet, and sweet for bitter;" the tendency of their discourse and writings evidently is, to confound the most important distinctions, and to prejudice men's minds against the truths, precepts, and ways of the Lord; and their self-sufficiency, and the arrogant and supercilious manner, in which they behave to believers, mark them out, as exposed to the additional wo, denounced on those, "who are wise "in their own eyes and prudent in their own sight." Whilst many, in this respect, glory in their shame; others, of a different description of rebels, can pride themselves in being mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink: as if their ability, through habit or constitution, to waste the gifts of God, to inveigle others to drunkenness, and to take that opportunity of cheating them, would plead an excuse for their excess! Wo be unto such men, and wo to that nation in which they obtain authority; for it cannot be expected that they should scruple to commit the most flagrant injustice, when their own lucre requires it. But whilst men thus "cast away "the law of the Lord, and despise his holy word;" they become fuel for the fire of his indignation, and destroy the very root of all their own prosperity: and after he hath smitten them, and their carcasses are torn in the streets, or lodged in the grave, "his anger will not be turned away, "but his hand will be stretched out still," to "destroy "both body and soul in hell." And the earth will indeed tremble and flee away, when he shall summon its inhabitants before his tremendous judgment-seat. Even in this world he will never be at a loss for instruments of his vengeance. At his signal they will come from the ends of the earth with unabated force and speed: when he gives commission, all resistance is vain: and as we know not how soon all earthly comforts and confidence may fail us, and sorrow and despair may overwhelm us; let us diligently seek the well grounded assurance, that "when flesh "and heart shall fail, God himself will be the Strength of "our heart, and our Portion for ever."

NOTES.

CHAP. VI. V. 1—4. It may be inferred from the first verse of this book, that Isaiah delivered messages from God before the death of Uzziah; but he was at this time more solemnly commissioned to the prophetical office, and prepared for the proper execution of it. This august symbolical vision of the glory of the Lord, is described as made at the temple. The several interposing veils being removed out of the way; for the vision related to those times, when the way into the holiest was to be made manifest. The Lord appeared to the prophet, sitting on a throne, as in human form; for he then "saw the glory of Christ, "and spake of him." (Note, John xii. 39—44.) And "no man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten "Son, he hath declared him." 'It was the unanimous sense 'of the ancient church, that all the divine appearances in 'the Old Testament, were made by the Son of God, by 'whom all the affairs of the church were ordered from the 'beginning.' (Lowth.) This "throne high and lifted "up," seems to have been the place of the mercy-seat, over which the glory of the Lord used to appear, and where he reigned, as the God of Israel and of the whole earth: and as an exterior symbol of his Majesty, his train, or the skirts of his robes, filled the whole temple.—Above, or rather over against, this throne, stood the seraphim, the burning ones, the most glorious of the angelic orders, glowing with the holy flame of divine love. They stood, as employed in celebrating his praises, and prepared to execute his mandates. Each of them had "six wings; "with twain he covered his face;" an emblem of his inability steadfastly to behold or fully to comprehend all the glory of the Lord, and of profound reverence and adoring awe "With twain he covered his feet;" denoting humility, as conscious that he and his services were unworthy the notice of the Lord, or even of the other seraphim in his presence. "And with twain he did fly;" representing prompt celerity and alacrity in executing the will of God. At the same time they sang aloud responsive to each other, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts." (Notes. Ex. xv. 20, 21. Rev. iv. 8.) This threefold repetition hath generally and justly been deemed to refer to the three divine persons in the Trinity; and to the holiness displayed in their several parts in the great work of redemption. For the seraphim seem to celebrate the Lord's holy hatred of sin, as displayed both in the salvation of the Gospel, and in the punishment of its opposers; in which respect the whole earth, as well as the heavens, has been or will be filled with his glory. Whilst this solemn hymn of praise was echoed from one to another of the angelic worshippers, the posts or pillars of the porch of the Temple shook at every response, and the whole house was filled with smoke, or thick darkness, as when dedicated by Solomon.

V. 5. This awful vision of the divine Majesty and the exalted worship of the seraphim, overwhelmed the prophet with a sense of his own vileness; (Marg. Ref.) and his humiliation was attended with great dismay. If these glorious spirits thought nothing of their exalted services; what would become of him, who had presumed to speak to JEHOVAH, with unclean and unhallowed lips? He had denounced woes on others; but he now perceived himself liable to the same condemnation; not only for his other sins, but also as "a man of unclean lips," as one, who had used his tongue, (which had often spoken vain and sinful words,) in declaring the message of God, and had mixed many defilements with his very worship and prophesying. He was sensible also that he dwelt among a "people of unclean lips," of the sinfulness of whose worship he was not fully aware, till "his eyes had seen the King "the LORD of hosts:" and having measured himself by them, he never was before so sensible of his own unworthiness, and unfitness for the prophetical office, which he now feared would only end in his and their condemnation. The Septuagint translation of this verse is very striking. 'And I said, O wretch that I am! for I am pierced 'through; because being a man, and having unclean lips, 'I dwell in the midst of a people having unclean lips; and 'I have seen with mine eyes the LORD of hosts.' (Rom. vii. 24.)—Bishop Lowth renders the first clause, "Alas "for me, for I am struck dumb:" (thus "every mouth "must be stopped:") 'and he immediately gives this 'reason, why he was struck dumb; because he was a 'man of polluted lips, and dwelt among people of pol-'luted lips; and was unworthy, either to join the Sera-'phim in singing praises to God, or to be the messenger of 'God to his people.' (Bp. Lowth,)—'In these words 'therefore he deprecates—the prophetical office. What 'the prophet here calls unclean, Moses styles uncir-'cumcised lips, (Ex. vi. 12;) where he excuses himself 'from a like employment, both from his own incapacity,

6 Then [x] flew one of the seraphims unto me, * having a live coal in his hand, [y] which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar:

7 And [z] he † laid it upon my mouth, and said, Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and [a] thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged.

8 Also [b] I heard the voice of the LORD, saying, [c] Whom shall I send, and who will go for [d] us? [e] Then said I, ‡ Here am I; send me.

9 And he said, [f] Go, and tell this people, [g] Hear ye ◊ indeed, but understand not; and see ye indeed, but perceive not.

10 Make [h] the heart of this people [i] fat, and make [k] their ears heavy, and shut their eyes; [l] lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, [m] and convert, and be healed.

11 Then said I, [n] LORD, how long? And he answered, [o] Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be ‖ utterly desolate;

12 And [p] the LORD have removed men far away, and there be [q] a great forsaking in the midst of the land.

'and from the cold reception he was like to meet with 'among the Israelites.' (Lowth.) It, however, appears to me, that the prophet expressed consciousness of guilt, as to the past, even in his worship and ministry, as well as apprehensions respecting the future.

V. 6, 7. The Lord was pleased to encourage his dismayed servant by a symbolical action of a seraph, who flew to him with a live coal from off the altar. The sacred fire from the altar of burnt offering represents the sacrifice of Christ and its effects; and the live coal applied to the prophet's lips, may denote the assurance given him of pardon and acceptance in his work, through the atonement of Christ; and the communication of divine grace, to cleanse away pollution, to kindle the flame of divine love in his heart, and to fit him for the execution of his office with zeal and fervency. (Notes, Acts ii. 3.)

V. 8. The Lord would not send his message to the people by the seraphim, but by a prophet like themselves: and he openly inquired whom he should send, that was willing to undertake the service? The expression "who "will go for us?" corresponds with several that have been already noticed. 'So God speaks in the plural number, '(Gen. i. 26.) which is justly thought to imply a plurality 'of divine persons. For it cannot be said with any proba-'bility, that God is described in Genesis, as advising with, 'or communicating his purposes to the angels, which is 'the fancy of the Rabbins: because the history of the cre-'ation takes no notice of angels; and consequently there is 'no ground for interpreting any text in that chapter with re-'lation to them.' (Lowth.) And now the prophet, who was before struck dumb, being assured of assistance and acceptance, and filled with zeal for the glory of God, readily answered, "Here I am, send me." He would go on any message, to any person, or any whither, whatever hardship, difficulty, and peril attended it.

V. 9, 10. This awful passage is quoted, or referred to, six times in the New Testament; (Marg. Ref.) which shows that the vision had relation to the rejection of Christ by the Jews, and their consequent calamities; as to the men of that generation, to whom the prophet was sent.—Where the word of God is not made effectual, through the regeneration of the Spirit, it often gives occasion to those very evils, which are most contrary to its genuine tendency: by opposing the pride, prejudices, and lusts of men, they become more outrageous; and by producing convictions which are violently resisted, the conscience grows callous: the uneasiness thus excited drives men into excess, infidelity, or furious enmity, for shelter; and when they are once engaged in open opposition, obstinacy and regard to carnal interests and credit among proud and ungodly men, push them forward to the most desperate extremes. Thus the gospel is heard, but not understood: something of its nature is seen, but the glory and excellency of it are not perceived: and men become more and more insensible to both promises and warnings, so that their hearts are made fat, their ears become heavy, they shut their eyes, and the whole tends to their deeper guilt and condemnation. God frequently leaves men to this judicial blindness and hardness for their other sins, especially for resisting the convictions of their own consciences, and the strivings of his Spirit. This was the awful case of numbers in the days of Isaiah, and in those of Christ and his apostles: and the Lord forseeing this effect, and intending to leave them to this obduracy, "lest they should see with their eyes, "and hear with their ears, and understand with their "hearts, and convert and be healed," or saved, commissioned the Prophet to go for this express purpose. 'The prophets 'are said to do things, when they declare God's purpose of 'doing them. (Jer. i. 10. Ez. xliii 3.) So here Isaiah is 'said to harden the people's hearts, &c. i. e. to declare this 'to be the event of his preaching; which prophecy should 'be more signally accomplished, when the Jews should re-'ject the preaching both of Christ and his apostles.'—"Make the heart of this people fat." (Note, Ps. cxix. 70.) 'This St. John expresses by hardening their heart. God 'is said to harden men's hearts, by those very means of 'grace, which are in themselves proper to produce a quite 'contrary effect: but withal he foresees, that meeting 'with a perverse and refractory temper, they will in the 'event render them more obdurate; and he is resolved, 'for great and wise reasons, not to hinder it.' (Lowth.) (Notes. Ex. iv. 21. ix. 12. Rom. ix. 15—23.) in the awful sentence. But he inquired how long this was to be the case? And was answered, that it would be thus, till the cities and lands were utterly desolated and the inhabitants carried into captivity; and this forsaking of the whole land would continue for a long time. This was verified in the Babylonish captivity; but much more emphatically in the final desolations of the Temple and of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersed and forsaken state of the Jewish nation, now above seventeen hundred years.

V. 13. The Lord meant to preserve a remnant, like the tenth or tithes, that were holy to him. These would return from captivity, and be converted to the truth and devoted to him, as those holy things that were eaten in his courts by the priests. Nay, the nation of Israel, in its lowest state, would be like an oak, or elm, or any other tree, that is stripped of its leaves, lopped, or cut down: yet the trunk or root still remains and has life in it, and will again shoot forth. Thus the remnant of believers, during and after the captivity, were a holy seed, the substance of the nation, which shot forth again and flourished: thus Christ especially, and with him the Jews who embraced Christianity, and incorporated with the Gentile converts when the nation was rejected, were the holy seed: and thus the Jews, who shall in due time become his disciples, are the holy seed; the substance of the tree, that hath been lopped and cut down, but which will at length revive and flourish again more than ever. "Though there be a tenth part remaining in it, even this "shall undergo a repeated destruction. Yet, &c." 'This 'passage, though somewhat obscure,—has been made so 'clear by the accomplishment,—that there remains little 'room to doubt the sense of it. When Nebuchadnezzar 'had carried away the greater and better part of the peo- 'ple into captivity; there was yet a tenth remaining in 'the land, the poorer sort, left to be vine-dressers and 'husbandmen under Gedaliah. Yet even these, fleeing in- 'to Egypt after the death of Gedaliah, miserably perished 'there. (Jer. xl—xliv.) And in the subsequent and more 'remarkable completion of the prophecy, in the destruc- 'tion of Jerusalem, and the dissolution of the common- 'wealth, by the Romans, when the Jews, after the loss 'of above a million of men, had become again numerous 'in their own country, Hedrian slew above half a mil- 'lion more of them, and a second time almost extirpated 'the nation. Yet after these, and so many other repeat- 'ed exterminations and massacres of them, we see, 'with astonishment, that the stock still remains, from 'which God, according to his promise frequently given 'by his prophets, will cause his people to shoot forth 'again, and to flourish.' (Bp. Lowth.) Let the reader reflect that this prophecy hath been extant two thousand five hundred years, by the acknowledgment of the Jews themselves; and, comparing it with the state of that remarkable people, in every subsequent age, and at this day; let him ask himself whether it does not prove, beyond doubt, that Isaiah spake by inspiration of God? Indeed the condition of the Jews through revolving ages, so different from that of any other nation, compared with the prophecies concerning them, both in the Old and New Testament, is a complete moral demonstration, that the Scriptures are the oracles of God; which is the only kind of demonstration the subject is capable of.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

The discovery of the glory of God prepares the heart for the exercise of every grace and the practice of every duty. Indeed all external symbols must be inadequate fully to represent the Lord's essential majesty and excellency: yet they may suit our present state, in which we see through a glass darkly. Though "the LORD is high and lifted "up;" yet in and through Jesus Christ, he is seated on a throne of grace, and the way into the holiest is now laid open. Whilst his full glory is displayed in his temple above, his train filleth the outer sanctuary: yea, he dwells in every broken heart, as in a temple in which he delighteth. Every rational creature worships God in humility and reverential fear, proportioned to the degree of his holiness and wisdom; and this is attended with an adequate measure of fervent love, gratitude, zeal, and delight in obedience. The cherubim and seraphim before the throne are so occupied in admiring and adoring the ineffable glories of JEHOVAH, that they have no leisure or inclination to admire themselves or commend one another. Satisfied with his approbation, they want no other praise: and they know that they cannot but possess each other's love, whilst they bear the image and concur in the worship of the Lord: for all the self-admiration, ambition, and mutual adulation of us sinful creatures, originate from ignorance and pride, and would be annihilated by clear and abiding views of the divine glory. The essential holiness of God reflects honour on all his natural attributes; whether he pardon or punish, he hath so arranged his plan, that his hatred of sin and love of justice will be displayed and adored; in the cross of Christ, and by the Gospel and its effects, the whole earth is or will be filled with his glory: and these form the most exalted and favourite themes even of the adoration of angels, who sing "Glory to God in the "highest, peace on earth, and good will to men." Nor is there one of them, who does not think it an honour to worship him who was crucified on Mount Calvary, even Him, whom infidels pride themselves in degrading and opposing! Nay, these blessed spirits vie with each other, who shall most fervently adore the triune God of our salvation. Even to witness their holy strains and active obedience would be more than we sinners could endure: yet they count all beneath his worth and undeserving of his notice. But such scenes are too dazzling for our constant contemplation: a few glimpses suffice to convince us, that "we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses

"as filthy rags." Nor is there a man on earth, who would not be ashamed of his most admired performances, and sink into habitual self-abhorrence, if he had a clear view of the divine glory, and of the worship of heaven: nay, this would be attended with despair; and he would no more dare to speak to the Lord with his polluted lips, if he so saw the justice, holiness, and majesty of God, as not to discern also his glorious mercy and grace in Jesus Christ. But when the atonement is understood, and by faith applied to the heart; the iniquity of our holy things is taken away, and "the conscience purged from dead works to serve the "living God;" and when by the Holy Spirit the love of his name is shed abroad in the heart, then the humbled sinner takes encouragement, and feels an ardent desire to glorify the Lord. And thus we become ready for any service in which he pleases to employ us: and neither the sense of our own unworthiness and insufficiency; nor a view of the importance and difficulty of the work: nor a prospect of hardships and injuries in it, will deter us from any attempt, to which we judge ourselves to be called in his providence; but we are ready to say, "Here I am, send me." The love of Christ constrains us, and encourages and prepares us for labouring with diligence, suffering with patience, and bearing injuries with persevering meekness.

V. 9—13.

They, whom the Lord sends to preach his Gospel, must expect in some instances, to labour without apparent success: and even to be the instruments of rendering many of their hearers more hardened and inexcusable in their crimes, and more ripe for divine judgments; even as if they were sent upon that melancholy business. We should, however, persist in praying for the divine blessing on our labours: and solemnly warn men of the danger of resisting their convictions, quenching the Spirit, and holding the truth in unrighteousness. And no humble inquirer after Christ need fear this awful doom, which is a spiritual judgment on those who hate the light, because they determine to hold fast their sins. Let then every one who hears or reads the Gospel, watch and pray against pride and love of wickedness, and all those previous provocations which tend to this dreadful obduracy: let none of them harden their hearts, lest God give them up to a strong delusion: and let every one pray for the illumination of the Holy Spirit, that he may perceive the glory and excellency of divine things, by which alone we are secured against this dreadful danger. And whilst we read of the fate of Jerusalem, and witness the sad state of the unbelieving Jews, let us take warning not to imitate their crimes. Blessed be God, he still preserves his church, for the sake of the remnant of true believers which are the substance of it: and, however professed Christians, or visible churches, may be lopped off as unfruitful branches; the holy seed shall shoot forth; yea, "Israel shall" yet again "bud and "blossom, and fill the face of the world with fruit." May the Lord hasten that glorious time, which shall be as life from the dead to all the nations of the earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. VII. V. 1. The Syrians and Israelites repeatedly vanquished the Jews with most terrible slaughter; but they could not take Jerusalem, or dethrone the family of David. (Notes, 2 Kings xvi. 5. 2 Chr. xxviii. 6—8.)

V. 2. Ahaz, though a very wicked man, was preserved, because he was a descendant of David, and of that family from which the Messiah was to arise. Perhaps his enemies had formed their plan of dethroning him and destroying his family, in contemptuous opposition to the promises and prophecies of God, respecting David and his seed. It is probable that this report was brought to him and his people, after the slaughter before-mentioned, and related to a second assault by the united forces of Syria and Ephraim. The terror which was excited by this information, is illustrated in a most striking simile: nor can it much be wondered at, when the success of the Syrians, and the dreadful blow already given by Ephraim alone, are considered; and when it is recollected that Ahaz and most of his subjects were entirely destitute of faith and well-grounded confidence in God.

V. 3. Isaiah seems to have been very little noticed by Ahaz, if at all, and perhaps could not have access to him in his palace: but he was ordered to meet him in a place that was pointed out to him; probably because Ahaz and his nobles assembled there, to concert measures for their defence. (Marg. Ref.) He was also commanded

4 And say unto him, [h] Take heed and be quiet; [i] fear not, * neither be faint-hearted for [k] the two tails of these smoking fire-brands, for the fierce anger of Rezin with Syria, and of the son of Remaliah

5 Because [l] Syria, Ephraim, and the son of Remaliah, have taken evil counsel against thee, saying,

6 Let us go up against Judah, and † vex it, and let us make a breach therein for us, and set a king in the midst of it, even the son of Tabeal:

7 Thus saith the Lord GOD, [m] It shall not stand, neither shall it come to pass.

to take Shear-jashub his son with him; but the reason of this command is not mentioned. Some think it was merely because his name, 'a remnant shall return,' was itself a sign of mercy in reserve for the Jews: others suppose that some reference was had to this child in the prophetical sign afterwards given. (Notes, 14—16.) 'The name, probably, alludes to the promise made by the prophet, of the people's return from captivity.' (vi. 13. x. 21. original.) (Lowth.) The word translated conduit, seems to mean an aqueduct, such as was formerly used for the conveyance of water, for the supply of populous cities. 'There were two pools which supplied Jerusalem with water: the upper pool, mentioned here, and called Gihon, (2 Chr. xxxii. 30.) and the lower pool.' (xxii. 9.) (Lowth.)

V. 4. Rezin and Pekah had been two fire-brands, and had made a dreadful conflagration; and the Jews feared still more fatal effects from their confederacy: but their success was at an end, and they were only the two tails of smoking fire-brands, which were ready to be wholly extinguished.

V. 6. Rezin and Pekah intended to subjugate the whole kingdom of Judah, and to divide it betwixt them, or to set over it another king as their vassal. It is not known who Tabeal was. The frequent mention of the house of David, and the sign afterwards given, indicate that they designed to destroy that family.

V. 7—9. As Damascus was the capital of Syria; so that kingdom was arrived at its height under Rezin, and would thenceforth decline: and Ephraim, or the kingdom of Israel, of which Samaria was the capital, was more prosperous under Pekah than it would ever afterward be; and in the space of sixty-five years, it would be so ruined as to be no more a people. It is computed to have been sixty-five years from this prediction to the time when Esarhaddon carried away captive the last remains of the Israelites, about the twenty-second year of Manasseh's reign. But the exact time, in which Esarhaddon carried away the remains of Israel, is not easily ascertained: much less can it be satisfactorily shown in what year of his reign Manasseh was carried to Babylon. There can, however, be no doubt, but that Ephraim ceased to be a people before, and very little before, the end of the sixty-fifth year after this prophecy was delivered. It was therefore absolutely determined that Syria and Israel would never subjugate Judah; yet unless Ahaz and his family and subjects believed the word of God, and depended on him for protection, they could not be established in prosperity, or secured from similar perils and terrors.

V. 10—12. As Ahaz did not properly regard the message from God; he was required to ask a sign for the confirmation of it; and as a proof that Isaiah spake by divine authority, he was allowed to choose one from the depth beneath, on earth, or in the grave; or, if that would be more satisfactory, (according to the prevailing opinion of the Jews, Matt. xvi. 1.) he might ask a sign from heaven. But he, probably, assenting in a general way to the promise which had been given, and perhaps not wishing any further intercourse with the prophet, lest he should reprove him for his sins; refused to ask a miraculous sign, pretending that he would not, without necessity, put the power and truth of God to the trial, or presumptuously demand his extraordinary interposition. He seems to have made some show of piety, but to have acted wholly under the influence of unbelief and alienation from God.

V. 13. Ahaz was the representative of the house of David, though utterly unlike his pious ancestor: and his obstinate rebellion and unbelief, not only wearied out the Lord's prophets and servants, which was no light matter, whatever he thought of it; but they were about to weary out the patience of God, to his own ruin, though the house of David would still be preserved. Perhaps some others of the royal family were present, with whom the prophet thus remonstrated. For the import of the word weary in this connexion, see the marginal references.

g viii. 4. ix. 11, 12 xvii. 1—3. 2 Kings xv. 29, 30. xvi 9.

V. 14. 'The Hebrew word here used, most properly signifies a virgin, and so it is translated by all the ancient interpreters; and it is never once used in the Scripture in any other sense, as several learned men have proved, against the pretensions of the modern Jews. The primary signification of the word is concealed; because of the custom of the eastern countries to keep their virgins concealed from the view of men.' (Lowth.) That the reader may judge of this for himself, I shall point out all the texts in which this word is used in Scripture. (Gen. xxiv. 43. Ex. ii. 8. Ps. lxviii. 25. Prov. xxx. 19. Cant. i. 3. vi. 8.) 'Christ is called "the Seed of the woman," (Gen. iii. 15.) as not to be born in the way of ordinary generation.' (Lowth.) 'The prophecy is introduced in so solemn a manner; the sign is so marked, as a sign selected and given by God himself: the terms of the prophecy are so peculiar, and the name of the child so expressive, containing in them much more than the circumstances of a common child required, or even admitted; that we may easily suppose, that in minds prepared by the expectation of a great Deliverer to spring from the house of David, they raised hope far beyond what the present occasion suggested; especially when it was found that in the subsequent prophecy this child, called IMMANUEL, is treated as the lord and prince of the land of Judah, (viii. 8.) Who could this be other than the heir of the throne of David? Under which character a great and even a divine person had been promised. St. Matthew, therefore, in applying this to the birth of Christ, takes it in its strictest, clearest, and most important sense; and applies it according to the original design and principal intention of the prophet.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'Would it not be very unnatural to suppose, that the prophets have been entirely silent concerning this remarkable sign of the Messiah, (viz. his being born of a virgin) insomuch that an evangelist should be obliged to accommodate to this singular circumstance a passage which originally had no reference to the Messiah?' (Granville Sharp.) 'GOD WITH US; which name can agree to none but to him who is both God and man. 'Thus we are to understand the Messiah's being called IMMANUEL, i. e. as being really what that name imports, GOD WITH US; being both properly and truly God, and also living and dwelling with us men.' (Lowth.) Indeed the conception and birth of a child, in the ordinary course of things, could scarcely have been called a sign, whatever name should be given him. The passage cannot be made to accord to any events of those times, as if it meant, 'that one, who was at that time a virgin, should be married, and bear a son, &c.' The application of the name Immanuel to one who was the governor of the land (viii. 8.) can comport with none but the reigning king, or the heir-apparent; but Hezekiah was born before his father Ahaz came to the throne; so that he cannot be meant: and to whom else can the several particulars be made to accord? We can therefore admit of no interpretation, (or even accommodation,) of the prophecy, except that given by the evangelist, (Matt. i. 23.) 'that a virgin of the house of David should miraculously conceive, and bear a son, who should be known to the church in all succeeding ages, as Immanuel, God with us;" God manifested in the flesh, and become our Brother and Saviour. He would be called by this name, as Solomon was called Jedediah; not that he should have no other name, or be commonly addressed by that name; but as it would properly belong to him, and he would be what that name signified. This sign was given to faith, and would encourage only believers; for it would assure them, that no designs formed to destroy the family of David could be successful, as such a blessing was in it. (Notes, Ex. iii. 12. Mic. v. 3.)

V. 15. Though this child should be miraculously conceived, and be properly called IMMANUEL; yet he would grow up like other children, by the use of the diet customary in those countries, till, or even when, his faculties were unfolded, and he became of age to distinguish between good and evil; and then, unlike other children, he would uniformly "refuse the evil and choose the good."—I confess that I am singular, or nearly so, in supposing this language to mean any thing more, than the capacity of distinguishing between good and evil: but, as all other children, when left to themselves, are disposed to choose the evil and refuse the good, decidedly preferring sin to holiness; and as Immanuel, that holy child, no sooner exercised the rational faculties of his human nature; but he, (and he alone) perfectly used them in a holy manner; I must be of opinion, that this singular case was intended by the sacred writer, or by the Holy Spirit, who inspired him to use these peculiar expressions. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 16. There is very great difficulty in making out the connexion betwixt this and the preceding verses; which is the case in some of the most remarkable predictions of Scripture: for the Lord seems purposely to cast an obscurity on them, as a trial of our humility, and to prove, whether we will receive and profit by what is obvious, though we cannot satisfactorily solve every difficulty; or whether we will proudly reject the whole on that account. Some suppose, that by this child, the prophet meant his own son Shear jashub, who stood by him: but this is not very natural; and it may be questioned, whether the expression, "shall know to refuse the evil, and choose the good," could properly be applied to him. Others think that the prophet meant, that in less time than would be required, after the birth of the Virgin's Son, for his attaining to this capacity, (that is, within two or three years) the dreaded enemies of Judah would perish. The land of Israel must, in this interpretation, be exclusively meant as the land which Ahaz dreaded and abhorred, for one land alone is spoken of; and both, her kings must denote Pekah and his ally, Rezin, king of Syria, and the former was soon after cut off by Hoshea, and the latter by Tiglath-pilezer. (Notes, viii. 4. 1 Kings xv. 30. xvi. 9.) But some have supposed that the whole of the promised land was intended, and that the termination of regal authority, both in Israel and Judah, before Immanuel should "know to refuse the evil and choose the good," was predicted. 'Before this child can know good from evil, 'this land, which thou art so solicitous about, shall be 'bereaved of both her kings; by which, we think ought 'to be understood, not the kings of Syria and Israel; for 'the former could not be called her (Canaan's) king, and 'the latter had but a share in it at best: but the kings of 'Israel and Judah; as it really was before the coming of 'the Messiah.' (Universal History.) The clause may be rendered, "the land by," or concerning, "which thou art "disquieted:" and both the dread of Israel and anxiety about Judah, disquieted Ahaz; and were to him as thorns or goads to keep him awake, (which the word may signify:) and no doubt the word king is often used for a succession of kings, in prophetical language. Now it is very remarkable, that Herod the great, the last who could be called the king either of Judah or Israel, lived till after Immanuel's birth, but died while yet he was an infant: and then, Shiloh being come, the sceptre departed finally from Judah, as it had long before from Israel. (Note, Gen. xlix. 10.) How far the prophecy may be supposed to have received a primary accomplishment, by the deliverance, within two or three years, of Judah from the two kings that threatened its destruction; and yet afterwards to have had a more striking and exact completion when Immanuel was born, and while he was yet an infant, the former being a confirmation and sure pledge of the latter; I shall leave it with the reader to determine: but upon so difficult and so important a subject, I was willing to adduce every hint, which might tend to a fuller elucidation of it.

V. 17—19. The Lord would not permit the Syrians and Israelites entirely to prevail against Ahaz: but he would have him and his idolatrous subjects to know, that such judgments were coming upon them as they had never experienced since the days of Rehoboam. These would be brought on them especially by the king of Assyria, on whom Ahaz placed an improper dependence; (Notes, 2 Kings xvi.) but the Egyptians would also concur in them. Probably Egypt abounded with troublesome and noisome swarms of flies: and Assyria might be remarkable for bees, which give great pain by their stings, and collect honey from every quarter. In allusion to these insects, the Lord intimated his design of giving the signal to those nations, to come in vast multitudes, and possess every part of the land. (Marg. Ref.) Judea lay between the kingdoms of Egypt and Assyria, and was continually harassed by those contending powers. The Assyrians weakened Ahaz, instead of helping him: Sennacherib exceedingly impoverished the land in Hezekiah's reign. The Assyrian king took Manasseh captive, and made the land tributary: and the kings of Babylon, who destroyed Jerusalem and desolated the land, ruled over many of the same countries. Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, slew good Josiah, and carried Jehoahaz prisoner into Egypt, and thus hastened the ruin of Judah. The uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, may mean those parts of the land which bordered upon the seven mouths of the river Nile; or which lay beyond them. 'Archbishop Usher supposes, that the conquest of Egypt '(xx.) happened before the siege of Jerusalem by Senna-'cherib; (it should have been the invasion of the land, for he was not permitted to besiege the capital (xxxvii. 33.) 'and that a great many Egyptians were his auxilia-'ries in that expedition.' (Lowth.)

V. 20. The Lord intended to employ the king of Assyria, (whom Ahaz had hired,) as his servant, in executing judgment on the land, and to give him the spoil of it for his wages: and he would destroy both the priests, princes, and the poor of the land in such a manner, that the desolation would resemble the razor clearing away the hair from the head, the feet, and the beard, without any discrimination. This gives an idea of much more terrible depredation and destruction by the Assyrian invasion, than we are apt to receive from a cursory reading of the history.

CHAP. VIII.

By the name given the prophet's son, the speedy ruin of Syria and Israel, and the invasion of Judah by the king of Assyria, are predicted, 1—8. The confederacy against Judah would be defeated, 9, 10. The Jews exhorted to fear and trust God, and not to fear man; as the way to safety, when numbers would be snared and destroyed, 11—15. The prophet, (as a type of Christ,) with his disciples, are signs to the people, 16—18. He warns them against diviners; directs them to the word of God; and predicts the blasphemy and despair of the rebellious, 19—22.

V. 21—25. Through the scarcity of inhabitants and of cattle after these desolations, the pastures would be so luxuriant, that a young cow and two ewes would plentifully supply a man's family with milk and butter, which, with honey, would be almost the only remaining productions of the land. Vineyards, that had been let at high rents, (as a thousand vines for a thousand pieces of silver yearly,) would then be overgrown with briers and thorns; and would become the coverts of wild beasts, or the resort of robbers, which the inhabitants should come with bows and arrows to destroy. Nay, the mattock and plough would be generally disused, of which the thorns and briers are figuratively represented as afraid; or the expression may mean, that those places, which were so well cultivated, that no one would have feared their being covered by briers and thorns, would then be over-run with them: in short, agriculture would cease, and the whole land would either become a forest, or a pasture for cattle. (Marg. Ref.)—The promise made to the Jews, just before the destruction of Sennacherib's army, may intimate, that the land had, during the preceding desolations, been generally left uncultivated, so as to become a forest or pasture land; and could not, till after some time, be converted into corn-fields and vineyards. (xxxvii. 30. Note, 2 Kings xix. 29.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Ungodly men are often punished by others as bad as themselves. "In the fear of the Lord is strong confi-"dence:" but they who despise him, not only meet with great afflictions, but are destitute of solid support under them; and the most daring rebels against God are frequently most terrified by perils from their fellow-creatures; so that their "hearts are moved, as the trees of the wood "are shaken by the wind." But whatever men devise, "the counsel of the Lord shall stand:" and regard to his own glory, and to his faithful word, frequently induces him to interpose in our favour, when there is nothing else to move him to it. When ungodly men are in distress or terror, they devise many expedients for safety: but they seldom think of humbling themselves before God, and seeking help from him; nay, if left to the bent of their own evil inclinations, they will rather venture any extremity of danger and misery than submit to it. Our God will, however, proceed with his own plan; and not leave sinners any excuse either through want of warning or encouragement, for continuance in sin. Whilst he hath work for the firebrands of the earth, they continue to consume all before them: but when they have fulfilled their commission, they will be extinguished in smoke and stench: and they are often on the summit of prosperity, and expecting its continuance and increase, when ruin suddenly overtakes them. We should then take heed to the word of God, and quietly wait its accomplishment; and, committing our cause to God, we need not be faint-hearted because of any enemies. But whatever unmerited and unexpected deliverances the Lord may vouchsafe, except we believe and obey his word, and trust in his protection, we cannot be established, either in outward prosperity or in serenity of mind.

V. 10—25.

The Lord is ever ready to satisfy the humble inquirer, who desires to believe his truth, yet is perplexed with difficulties and objections; but no evidence can convince such as hate the light, because they are enemies to God, through pride of heart and love of sin: and infidelity is equally provoking, whether it haughtily despise the evidence which the Lord vouchsafes, or whether it presumptuously demand such proof as the case does not require or admit. But ungodly men always varnish over their crimes with some specious colouring, even when their rebellion is most daring: and many pretend a fear of tempting God, when in fact they are determined not to trust or serve him. It is, comparatively, but a small thing for men to grieve and weary the faithful and pious servants of God, that honestly seek their good: alas! sinners also weary the Lord himself, and daily urge him to execute vengeance upon them. But he will encourage humble believers, whilst he leaves hardened infidels to their own delusions: and the recollection of those promises, which will surely be fulfilled in their season, tends greatly to invigorate true faith, in the most trying circumstances. If the prospect of the coming of the divine Saviour was a never-failing support to the hopes of ancient believers: what cause have we to rejoice and be thankful, that "the virgin hath conceived and born "a son, and called his name Immanuel:" that "the Word "was made flesh;" and that in our nature he passed through the several stages of childhood, youth, and manhood, to fulfil all righteousness, as our Surety, and to set us an example through all, of "refusing the evil and "choosing the good;" and then closed his life, by offering himself an all-sufficient sacrifice for our sins! may we learn to trust and love him, as now risen, ascended, and in our nature and for our benefit, reigning upon the mediatorial throne; and whilst we come to our reconciled Father through his advocacy, may we copy his example through every scene of life and death. Thus we shall speedily be delivered from all that we dread or abhor, and become more than conquerors over every enemy, through him that loved us. But sorrows of every kind are speedily coming on all those who neglect so great salvation: nor can any dignity or sacredness of character, or obscurity and meanness, preserve those from divine judgments, who continue in rebellion against God. The desolations which sin hath brought on many churches and nations, that once were very prosperous, not only give warning to others not to copy their example, but they teach every individual to moderate his regard to those objects which may soon be torn from him; and they awfully assure us, that if we remain unfruitful under the means of grace, the Lord will shortly pronounce sentence on us, and say, "Let no fruit "grow on thee henceforth for ever."

NOTES.

CHAP. VIII. V. 1—4. This chapter begins a new message, which some think is concluded at the seventh verse of the ninth chapter, but others suppose to be continued to the end of the twelfth chapter. The Lord commanded his prophet to take a large roll, sufficient to contain in legible characters the prophecy to be delivered; and "to write in it with a man's pen," that is, in the plainest manner. Some render the word translated a roll, a plate of polished brass, such as were used for mirrors; and by a man's pen, an engraving tool, as distinguished from an instrument used by women which was called by the same name; that being written in this manner, it might be publicly exhibited. (Note, Hab. ii. 2.) The prophecy was "concerning Maher-shalal hash-baz," which signifies, to hasten the spoil, to take quickly the prey. It is probable that this title was affixed to the prophecy, and it was thus intimated that the Assyrians would speedily and rapidly execute the predicted vengeance. The prophet "took faithful witnesses to record," that they might be ready to testify, if required, that he wrote the prophecy at the time mentioned, and prior to the events foretold. And his wife, (called the prophetess, either on account of her relation to him, or because she too was endued with the spirit of prophecy,) being pregnant at that time, or lately delivered, he was ordered to give the same name to the child, as a memorial of the prediction, and a token of its accomplishment. For before this child should know how to cry "My father and my mother," which children soon learn, (Note, vii. 15.) the king of Assyria would seize and carry away the immense riches of Damascus, and all the spoil of Samaria. So that this message was delivered soon after the preceding. Some expositors think, that the witnesses and the record imply, that Isaiah on this occasion married another wife; though it is not said that the mother of Shearjashub was dead, (vii. 3:) but others suppose, that these witnesses (who were persons of rank, though Uriah was a man of very bad character,) (Marg. Ref.) were called on to attend the circumcision of the prophet's son, and to attest the name by which he was called, as well as the prophecy confirmed or illustrated by that name. 'And I took unto 'me faithful witnesses, both of this act that I did, in fast-'ening this roll upon the doors of the Temple, and the 'name given to my said son, in his circumcision: for 'my wife, the prophetess, had conceived and borne a son, 'and the Lord had appointed me to call him by this name.' (Bp. Hall.)—It has been thought that these scenes were only acted in vision; but this seems a dangerous liberty in explaining Scripture. (Note, Hos. iii. 1—3.)

V. 6—8. Perhaps there was a party in Judah disaffected to the family of David, that secretly favoured the confederates; and this part of the prophecy might be addressed to them, as well as the people of Israel who had revolted from that family. Shiloah was a rivulet near Jerusalem, from which the pool of Siloam, probably, was supplied, of which the very name had a typical meaning. (John ix. 7.) The gentleness of this small current represented the mildness and equity of the government of David and his posterity, compared with that of other neighbouring princes. The Israelites, and many Jews also, ungratefully forgot their obligations to the house of David, and through unbelief, despised the still greater blessing which was to descend from it: so that, contemning its enfeebled condition, they were ready to concur with Rezin and Pekah in their attempts to destroy it. As a gentle brook is an apt emblem of a mild government; so a large impetuous overflowing river aptly represents a mighty conqueror and a powerful tyrant: and God was about to bring the waters of such a torrent to punish the people for rejecting David's family, and for their multiplied sins. Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, at the head of numerous and veteran troops, glorying in his conquests, and grasping after new acquisitions, was like a mighty river overflowing all his banks, and rolling his impetuous streams through the adjacent lands. The kingdom of Judah was represented as a human body. The inundation reached even to the neck; but the head, the capital city, Jerusalem, still remained above water. The success of the Assyrian was also described by the similitude of a monstrous bird of prey, which stretched forth its wings over the whole land. Yet the prophet, in predicting these dreadful scenes, addressed himself to Immanuel in person, as the proprietor of this land: the promised Messiah, in the form of God, was then Lord of that land especially: there, in the fulness of time, he would surely assume human nature, and appear in the form of a servant; and he would therefore certainly deliver his land from Sennacherib's invasion, for his own sake and for the sake of his promise to David his servant. 'The 'prophet never calls Immanuel his son: and here he speaks 'of him as a distinct person from both the children above 'mentioned, and in such a style, as befits none but him 'that was to be, in an eminent manner, both the Son of 'David and king of Israel.' (Lowth.)

V. 9, 10. These verses are a bold challenge to all the enemies of God's people. (xxxvii. 35.) Let as many of them as would combine together; let them strengthen themselves, and prepare for the attempt by every means which they could devise; let them concert their operations with the most profound policy, and promise themselves and each other success, with the utmost confidence; and give their orders with the greatest decision: their efforts would be frustrated, and themselves broken to pieces. This he repeated three times, to show his confidence that it would certainly be so, "for," says he, "God is with us." The word is "IMMANUEL," referring to the virgin's son before promised: as this blessing was ensured to them, no counsel or confederacy which interfered with it could prosper. This prediction has been fulfilled in the ruin of Syria and Israel: in the destruction of Sennacherib's powerful armies from various countries; and in that of Babylon and its dependencies: and it is equally applicable to every combination against the church of Christ, and will be fulfilling till the last enemy shall be put under his feet.

V. 11—15. The Prophet next declared the instruction, which the Lord had powerfully impressed upon his mind, by no means to walk in the way of that people. The Lord spake to him, (as if, in a most encouraging manner, he had taken him by the hand while he taught him,) "saying, Say "ye not a confederacy," &c. This was a caution to them not to give credit to every report of combinations formed against them, and not to yield to desponding fears. The word rendered confederacy, is commonly used in a bad sense, for an unlawful conspiracy; and the combination of Rezin and Pekah was an impious attempt to defeat the promises of God to the house of David. It was also the effect of unbelief in the Jews, to be so alarmed at a confederacy which was sure to be defeated; and their propensity to form alliances with heathen princes arose from distrust of God, and disregard to his commandments. 'Many of the Jews 'were secret friends to Rezin and Pekah, and this circum-'stance increased the fears of that invasion; because it 'was given out that they had a strong party among the 'people of Judea. (Lowth.) This was a conspiracy in the 'criminal sense of the word.' Instead of this sinful fear of man, they were called on to "sanctify the LORD of "hosts himself, and let him be their fear, &c." That is, they were required to honour his glorious majesty, to dread his wrath, to reverence his authority, to cleave to his worship and service, and to trust in his mercy, truth, and power. For he would be a Sanctuary, a holy Refuge to such as thus sanctified him: but at the same time, he would be "for a Stone of stumbling, and an occasion of falling, "a trap, and a snare," to both Jews and Israelites who did not. In the time of Sennacherib's invasion, and during the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the consequent captivity, and at many other times; whilst true believers found the Lord a sanctuary to them, multitudes of unbelieving Jews were emboldened in their presumptuous confidence, by their external relation to God, and by their privileges: and this unwarranted dependence, whilst they continued in sin, proved a snare to them, and accelerated their ruin. But the references made to this and similar passages, in the New Testament, point out its grand accomplishment: and show whom the apostles understood to be the "LORD of "hosts himself." (Marg. Ref.) For whilst Christ and his cross were a sanctuary to the remnant of believers, they proved a stumbling block to the Jewish nation in general; and their erroneous explication of their scriptures, and false confidence that God would protect them, ensnared them to their ruin, which was attended with unheard of circumstances of horror. 'This text is directly spoken of 'God by the prophet, but applied to Christ in the New 'Testament. A plain proof that Christ is God, and is 'described as such by the prophets.' (Lowth.)

V. 16. The prophet delivered the testimony, or message and command, of God to the people; but they, being generally blinded by their prejudices and sins, did not understand his words; so that they were bound up and sealed among his disciples, or those who cordially attended on his instructions. Nay, they were in a great measure closed and sealed up from believers, as they related to future events; yet the prophet was ordered to preserve his predictions as a sacred deposit for future ages. (Notes, Dan. xii. 4.) Thus the doctrines, promises, predictions, and commandments of Christ, were sealed among his disciples: others disregarded them, and the Jews in particular have the veil upon their hearts to this day: nay, where the word of Christ relates to future and remote events, it is sealed up even from his disciples, until its accomplishment.

V. 17. The prophet foresaw that the Lord would hide his face, and withdraw the tokens of his special favour from the house of Jacob; but he would wait on him, and look for his return in favour to them. This might refer to preceding calamities, and to the Babylonish captivity, and the restoration of the Jews to their own land: but it seems also to mark out their present rejected and dispersed state, and to imply a promise of their future admission into the church.

V. 18. The Prophet had called the two children, "whi[illegible]d had given him," by very significant names; (vii. 3. viii. 3.) and every time they were mentioned, they would bring his predictions of judgment and of mercy to remembrance. Some of the people would be astonished, that the prophet should give them such remarkable names: and others would deride both him and them with the most entire scorn and contempt. So that "he and his children "were for signs and wonders in Israel, from the LORD," who had ordered him thus to call them. For though they were not miraculous signs confirming to the senses the certainty of the predictions; yet they were memorials from God concerning them, suited to excite attention and expectation. St. Paul has quoted this passage in an argumentative discourse, and applied it in such a manner, as proves, that Immanuel himself, and his people whom he condescends to own both as brethren and children, were primarily intended: (Heb. ii. 13.) He was "a sign, that "should be spoken against;" (Luke ii. 34.) and they have ever been beheld with wonder and derision, or detestation, because of their conformity to him, and their zealous attachment to his cause, doctrines, and precepts. This is, among many others, a clear instance, by the apostle's testimony, of a twofold fulfilment of prophecies: one more immediate, but less important or adequate, the other more remote, but more fully answering to the emphatical language of the inspired writer.

V. 19. The unbelieving Jews were prone to seek information, counsel, and help from diviners and wizards of different descriptions, which was expressly forbidden in the law, and was in fact worshipping the devil. These persons, it seems, used strange fantastic gestures in their incantations, such as peeping out of the corners of their eyes, and muttering as if they spake out of their belly; with other ceremonies suited to their abominable practices. But when the Jews were persuaded to seek unto such persons, they were instructed to inquire, whether a people should not seek to their God? And whether it were right or reasonable to leave the living to consult the dead; the living God, to consult dead idols, or the spirits of dead men, whom these witches and wizards pretended to bring up to them? A strong expression of indignant abhorrence. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The law of God is the standard of duty; his sure testimony, the standard of truth; his promise, the firm ground of hope. If, therefore, the people wanted instruction, counsel, or encouragement, let them go to the law, truths, and promises of God's word. If they would not receive the prophet's message, or doubted its authenticity, let them recur to the law of Moses and other preceding parts of revelation. Let them prove all their principles and practices by this standard. But if any were so perverse as to reject and contradict this rule, it was plain they were devoid of spiritual understanding, for no hope or comfort could be found in any other way. 'They have no 'knowledge, but are blind leaders of the blind.' Philosophical illuminators and enthusiastical pretenders to new revelations, not to be judged of by the law and the testimony, are alike concerned in this descision. Its effect, however, is counteracted, in some cases, by a critical difficulty, supported by high authority; as if our translation could not convey the true meaning; because the root of the word rendered light, signifies to make dark. But the same noun is used for the morning, or day-break, (when a little light diminishes the darkness,) in the following passages, among many others, (Gen. xxxvii. 24. 26. Josh. vi. 15. 1 Sam. ix. 26. Job xxxviii. 12. Ps. cxxxix. 9.) though it certainly has another meaning in some places. So that the last clause, I apprehend, with deference to so high authority, may be fairly translated: "if they speak not according to "this word, it is because no morning or dawn of light is "in him;" i. e. in any one of them.

V. 21, 22. Inevitable and intolerable evils were coming on each of those who rejected the testimony and law of God, to trust in diviners or carnal confidences. None of them would by any means escape the approaching calamities, and all would pass through them in the utmost distress and penury. And when ready to perish with hunger, they would increase their own anguish by impatience; they would curse their king or rulers, for their ruinous measures, and even blaspheme God, while in vain they looked upward for help. Nor could any assistance or relief be got from man: but on which side soever they looked, they would behold troubles, dismay, and increasing anguish; till hardened in impious and impenitent rage and blasphemy, they would be driven into final despair and misery. This may predict the miseries of many individuals in Sennacherib's invasion; and the dreadful calamities during the siege and sack of the city by the Chaldeans: but it most exactly corresponds to the account given by Josephus of the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the miseries connected with that awful event.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

We have continual reason to bless God for causing his revealed will to be written for our instruction, "with a "man's pen," in language level to our feeble capacities; and for giving us, in his providence, a faithful translation of the Scriptures into our own tongue. They who treat on divine matters, should study plainness, that men in general may understand them; even though it should interfere with the display of their eloquence and erudition, and with their reputation among the learned and judicious few. The accomplishment of the prophecies forms so conclusive an evidence of the divine original of the Scriptures, that too much care cannot be taken to ascertain, that they were written on the occasions mentioned in them: and the testimony of the Jews, who have ever been faithful witnesses to record that the books of the Old Testament have been handed down, through succeeding ages, from the persons whose names they bear, is very valuable and useful, as a conclusive argument in our controversy with the enemies of our holy faith. We should endeavour that every surrounding object may remind us of the words of God, whether of judgment or of mercy; and that those treasures which men idolize or abuse, will speedily be torn from them. They who reject the salvation and authority of Christ, and refuse his peace and consolation, that they may rejoice in worldly confidences and pleasures, will soon find their licentious liberty to be the basest slavery, their joys to terminate in anguish, and their security in desperation. But happy are the subjects of Immanuel who live in his land; for he will take care of his church in the most urgent circumstances. The enemies of his cause may often come in, like an inundation from some mighty river, overflowing all its banks; they may sweep to destruction numbers of mere professors, and occasion many troubles to believers; but the church will hold her head above water, in the worst of times, and may bid defiance to all the hosts of her enemies. Let persecuting kings and nobles conspire against her with combined power; let wealth and nobility unite with learning, genius, and philosophy, to run down the despised doctrine of the cross; let men of every nation associate, and gird themselves; let them take counsel, give laws, menace, boast, speak, write, triumph: yet, as Jesus is "Immanuel, "God with us," we may boldly say "the LORD of hosts "is with us, the God of Jacob is our Refuge." Their counsel shall come to nought, their word shall not stand; and the present and future enemies of the church shall share the fate of those who formerly have been broken to pieces; and be constrained to say, 'Thou hast overcome, O Naza-'rene.'

V. 11—22.

It requires the powerful influences of divine grace to preserve even pious men from conforming in some respects to the way of mere professors of Christianity; and from either desponding, or employing carnal weapons, in perilous times. When Christians see persecuting powers or boasting scholars, combining against the people or truths of Christ, they are ready to give up all for lost. But let us not be thus dismayed: the cause of God is in no danger; but the ruin will fall either upon open opposers or hypocritical friends. They who sanctify the LORD of hosts himself, and fear and trust in him as dwelling in human nature; who value nothing in comparison with his grace, and fear nothing so much as coming short of it, or dishonouring his name, shall find him a Sanctuary, and be kept by his power through faith unto salvation. But the crucified Immanuel, who was, and is, a stumbling-stone and a rock of offence to unbelieving Jews; is no less so to thousands who are called Christians. The preaching of the cross is foolishness in their esteem: his doctrines and precepts, and the reproach of his cause offend them; and yet they rely on a name, a form, or a notion, and are buoyed up in vain-confidence, till they are snared and taken captive by Satan at his will. Even to this day, the truths and commands of Christ are sealed from the generality of his nominal disciples; so that they do not perceive the nature or glory of them. It is given to believers only, to know the mysteries of the kingdom of God: but to them that are without, all is enveloped in parables; (vi. 9, 10.) "The "secret of the LORD is with them that fear him," and they are all taught of God: yet their knowledge will not be complete, till the mystery of God be finished, and till they see him face to face. In the mean time, they wait on him and look for him, even when he hideth his face from them, and is pleased to leave his church in trouble: and they will not wait or look in vain. He will come at death to receive their souls; he will come ere long to render his truth universally victorious; and he will come at length to raise the dead, and to judge the world. As the divine Redeemer was contradicted and blasphemed, and treated with the utmost scorn and enmity, even by Israel; and as he is not ashamed to call us his brethren and children: surely we should not be averse to be treated by the world, and even by professed Christians, as He was, and as prophets and apostles were in their days. But let us aim to be a memorial and an example to them: and let parents so educate their children, and ministers so watch over their people, as that they may have a good hope of being able to say, in the great day of account, "Behold I, and the chil- "dren whom the LORD hath given me;" and then will their salvation be completed "from the LORD of hosts, which "dwelleth in Zion." Let us then keep close to his word and ordinances, and not listen to deceivers, of whatever name, who would excite our attention by unscriptural and unauthenticated pretensions to intercourse with the world of spirits; or who use whimsical and unaccountable observances, by way of charms or incantations, in order to obtain supernatural help and information. Should not God's people trust in him, and seek assistance from him alone? and should they use any suspicious or unwarranted means of obtaining relief? And would not this be, to go from the living God to seek help from the dying or the dead? Let us go to the law of God, where all such practices are condemned; and to his testimony, where all needful or desirable help is promised, in the use of appointed or allowed means. Let us try all doctrines and practices by that unerring rule; and so trust his promises, as to obey his precepts. In all this is neither obscurity, nor any thing dubious: but they who speak contrary to this word, and attempt to establish aught in opposition to this rule, are evidently infatuated and blinded by the god of this world. And all the miseries which ever were felt or witnessed on earth, are as nothing, compared with that anguish, despair, and blasphemy, which will shortly overwhelm them. Then will they fret themselves, and curse those who have led them into their delusions; and looking round on every side for help but in vain, they shall be driven into the blackness of darkness for ever. May the Lord preserve us from such condemnation!

NOTES.

CHAP. IX. V. 1. The connexion of this verse with those that precede it, is attended with great difficulty; and its meaning, as it stands in our translation, very perplexed. It probably should be rendered, "But there shall "not hereafter be darkness in the land that was distressed: "in the former times He debased, or made vile the land "of Zebulon, &c.: but in the latter time he hath made "it glorious: even the way of the sea, beyond Jordan, "Galilee of the Gentiles." (Bp. Lowth.) The kings of Assyria first ravaged those countries which lay on the coasts of the sea of Tiberias, and on the northern part of Jordan, called Galilee of the Gentiles, as bordering on the Gentiles, or long occupied by them; and that region was first favoured and honoured with the preaching of the Gospel by Christ and his apostles. (Marg. Ref.) The word rendered "more grievously afflict," may mean, and indeed more properly signifies, "made glorious;" and this gives a clear sense to the passage. Whatever afflictions came upon unbelievers, mercy was reserved for Israel, which would be first communicated to those parts of the land which had been first ruined. And this event seems to have been exclusively predicted, according to St. Matthew's interpretation of it.

V. 2. When Israel forsook the law and testimony of God, the nation was left in darkness and ignorance, wickedness and misery; as "in the land of the shadow "of death," a shadow of the state of the wicked in another world. But when Christ came, "a great light "shined upon them," to show them the path of truth, comfort, and holiness. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3. The nation of Israel was immensely multiplied, notwithstanding all their calamities: yet in general their joy was not increased, because of their sins. But when this light arose, believers rejoiced before God with holy joy, as men rejoice when they reap the harvest after the toil of cultivation, or when they divide the spoil after the perils of the battle. 'When thou shalt thus graciously 'visit thy people, howsoever the nation shall not be greater 'than it now is, yet the joy of it shall be more: as now 'contrarily, the people are more, but the joy is not more.' (Bp. Hall.) Some manuscripts read, (as the margin of the Hebrew also does,) 'Thou hast to it (or to the nation, 'to Israel,) increased joy:' which seems to denote, that the events predicted would be the source of greater joy to all true Israelites, than any of their former deliverances, though at the same time unbelievers would be driven into darkness.

V. 4, 5. The Jews were successively delivered from the yoke of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians: but this was only a shadow of deliverance from the yoke of Satan. And this redemption seems here especially predicted, as if already accomplished. By the Gospel of Christ and the pouring out of his Spirit, the Lord brake the yoke from off his people, and delivered them from the heavy burden, hard drudgery, and cruel treatment of that insolent oppressor; as in the day when he delivered Israel from the Midianites by Gideon: (Note, Judg. vii. 7—25.) Those battles, by which successful warriors rescued nations from oppression, were attended "with confused noise, and "garments rolled in blood:" but the redemption here predicted would be "with burning, and fuel of fire:" the influences of the Spirit are like purifying fire; sharp afflictions as a fiery trial, refine believers as gold in the furnace: and the predicted events were attended with most tremendous vengeance upon the unbelieving Jews. (Marg. Ref.) The latter verse is obscure; and some explain it of the burning of the weapons of war, the accoutrements of warriors, and the garments rolled in blood, under the reign of the Prince of peace. (Ps. xlvi. 9. Ez. xxxix. 8—10.)

V. 6, 7. The connexion of this illustrious prophecy with the preceding verse assures us, that the immediate scope of the Holy Spirit in the whole, was to point out the coming and kingdom of Christ. The prophet spake of the predicted blessings, as if already communicated, "Unto us," says he, "a child is born." Angels say, "Unto you;" (Luke ii. 11:) but this child was born for the benefit of us men, of us sinners, of us believers, of all believers from the beginning to the end of the world. "Unto us a Son is given." The only-begotten Son of God was given to and for us, to become the Son of man; that he might be our Surety, Sacrifice, Advocate, and Salvation: he was given by the Father, and he gave himself.—"And the government shall be on his shoulder." The Redeemer rules not only over his people, but over all worlds as Mediator, for their benefit; and he is able to support the weight of this universal and absolute authority. "His name shall be called Wonderful:" he is wonderful in his person, as IMMANUEL God and man; in his love and mercy; in his hatred of sin and righteous regard to the holy law; in his compassion to the vilest of sinners; in his majesty and humiliation; in his perfect righteousness and willing sufferings; and in the method which he took to baffle Satan, overcome death, reconcile divine justice and mercy, and establish his kingdom by dying on the cross. In every part of his character and work, he may justly "be called Wonderful:" and also, in that his glory is incomprehensible, "for no man knoweth the Son but "the Father." (Note, Judg. xiii. 18—22.) He is also the "Counsellor:" the Word and Wisdom of God came forth from him, to make known his perfections, truths, and will; to be made wisdom to us; and to be our infallible Counsellor in all difficulties and perplexities; so that they who depend on his guidance, and pray for his Spirit, are led in the midst of the paths of judgment. For this child born is indeed "the mighty God," one with, and equal to the Father, according to the sacred mystery of the Trinity in Unity: he possesses all divine attributes, and exercises them through his human nature: and thus is he "mighty" to save his people, and to vanquish and destroy all enemies. He is also "the everlasting Father:" "the second Adam, the "Lord from heaven," "the everlasting Father" of the whole church, which derives its spiritual being and life from him, as the whole race of men derive their existence from the first Adam: "the Author of eternal salvation:" 'The Author of eternity, by whom the church and every 'member of it, shall have immortal life.' And as he hath loved his church with an everlasting love; so he will for ever live to bless it, as "the Prince of peace:" the great Author of reconciliation to God; the Giver of peace in the heart and conscience; the Prince, who commands all his subjects to live at peace with each other, and inclines them to follow peace with all men." "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no "end." When his kingdom is truly set up in the heart, the efficacy of it shall endure and increase for ever: as it is set up on earth, it shall continue to diffuse its influence, till his authority be universally submitted to, and produce universal harmony; so that men shall "beat their swords "into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; "nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither "shall they learn war any more:" yet even this shall increase, and be perfecting in heaven. He shall reign "upon the throne of David, to order it and establish it "from henceforth even for ever." He rules in perfect wisdom and equity; he requires righteousness of his subjects, and teaches them to do judgment: he justifies and sanctifies them, and at length will present them faultless before his Father's throne. And though his mediatorial kingdom, as he reigns in human nature over all worlds, to fulfil his gracious undertakings, will then terminate, "that God may be all in all:" yet his special relation to his people, as their Lord and King, will endure for ever. —These predictions implied most stupendous interpositions of the Lord, in the behalf of his people; and the performance of them would be connected with immense difficulties: yet the seal of the Lord, for the glory of his own justice, truth, and love, and of his holy law and service, would ensure the performance of them; and his power as the LORD of hosts would render the whole perfectly easy. The exact coincidence of this prophecy with the doctrine of the New Testament, in the literal interpretation of each, shows evidently, that Jewish prophets and Christian teachers had precisely the same view of the person and salvation of the Messiah; and not only tends to demonstrate the divine authority of the Scriptures, in opposition to avowed infidels of every name; but to assure us of the doctrines intended to be taught by them, that we may be fortified against the subtle attempts of more covert enemies to explain them away.

V. 8—12. 'This whole passage,' (to the fourth verse of the next chapter,) 'reduced to its proper and entire 'form, and healed of the dislocation, which it suffers, 'by the absurd division of the chapters, makes a distinct 'prophecy and just poem, remarkable for the regularity 'of its disposition, and the elegance of its plan. It has 'no relation to the preceding or the following prophecy; 'though the parts, violently torn asunder, have been, on 'the one side or the other, patched on to them. Those 'relate principally to the kingdom of Judah; this is addressed exclusively to the kingdom of Israel.' (Bp. Lowth.) The Lord had, in the law of Moses and by the ministry of the prophets, denounced dreadful threatenings on those of the seed of Jacob who renounced his worship; and this word lighted, or was about to have its full effect, on the people of Israel. Then the Ephraimites, (the kingdom of the ten tribes,) and the citizens of Samaria, would know the truth of God's word, and the power of his wrath. 'With briers and thorns Gideon taught 'the men of Succoth; (Judg. viii. 16.) or as the margin 'reads, made them to know what they had deserved.' (Lowth.) For under more gentle rebukes, by the first inroads of the Assyrian kings, they continued proud and stout-hearted, and despised the judgments of God; boasting that they would rebuild their ruined cities and palaces in a more magnificent manner, and with more durable materials. But indeed He was about to visit them with more dreadful vengeance: for the king of Assyria, the adversary of Rezin, would shortly subjugate Syria; and then under the command of the conqueror, the Syrians would appear as enemies to Israel: and whilst these combined forces met them from the east, the Philistines would also attack them from the west, and cut off those who attempted to flee. Thus they would devour Israel with open mouth, as the wolf does the helpless lamb, or in every corner, as it may be rendered: yet even this would not appease the Lord's anger, or prevent his continuing to execute vengeance upon them. Some expositors, by a change in the text, on the authority of several manuscripts, suppose that the princes, not the enemies, of Rezin are meant: but in fact the desolations of Israel were principally made by the Assyrians, after they had subverted the kingdom of Syria; and we do not any where read, that either Rezin or his princes invaded the kingdom of Israel.

V. 13—17. The Israelites did not repent of their sins, or return to the worship of the Lord, when he punished them; nor did they seek help and protection from his power. He was therefore determined to cut off every order and description of men from the land: even the head and the tail, as from the body of an animal; even the stoutest branch from a tree, and the rush that grows in poor or marshy lands. By the head, the elders and nobles of the land were intended; and their false prophets were the tail, the most worthless and contemptible part of the body politic. For both their rulers and teachers had flattered the people in sin, and grievously misled them to their destruction: (Note, iii. 12:) and they were become so wretchedly corrupt, that every one was either profane, or a hypocrite in his religion, (if he pretended to any,) and an evil doer in his dealings, and deceitful in his conversation: so that God could no longer take pleasure in any of them, neither would he have mercy on orphans and widows, seeing even they were involved in the general guilt and condemnation; nor would any judgments short of utter ruin appease his wrath, or terminate the execution of his vengeance.

V. 18—21. The wickedness of the nation, like a fire for a time smothered up, would at length burst forth into an universal conflagration, causing all their glory to vanish, as the columns of smoke ascend and dissipate. For their sins would render them fuel for the wrath of God, and this would darken all their hopes and prosperity: and whilst his judgments and their enemies straitened them on every side, they would be so infatuated as to destroy each other without mercy. In their extreme necessity they would plunder one another; snatching on every side for sustenance, yet consumed by unsatisfied hunger, till they were ready to tear their own flesh, or to destroy their nearest relations, as both Manasseh and Ephraim were descended from Joseph. The more they were wasted, the more furious would their contentions be; and yet, if occasion offered, the most enraged parties would unite to harass the kingdom of Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

The Lord sometimes visits with his choicest mercies those places that have experienced his severest vengeance: and the Gospel, faithfully preached, is an abundant counterbalance for all the temporal vexations to which any nation hath been exposed. Wretched is the state of fallen man without this blessed word of salvation. Men walk on still in darkness, yea, in the way to final darkness. Such must have been the dreary condition of the whole human race, ever since the entrance of sin, had it not been for the promised Saviour, who in the fulness of time came a Light into the world, to lighten the Gentiles, and to be the Glory of his people. Blessed be God, this Sun of Righteousness hath risen on our land, and still shines around us with glorious splendour: yet numbers prefer darkness, and choose to continue in the land of the shadow of death, that they may have no disturbance in their sinful pursuits. Yea, many who glory of living in this enlightened age, and even of being its luminaries, hate this heavenly light, and prefer to it their own proud imaginations and vague conjectures! But let us remember that this light is intended "to guide our feet into the ways of "peace:" and let us earnestly pray, that it may shine into our hearts, and make us wise unto salvation. Then indeed the multiplying of believers will increase our joy in the Lord. This will far exceed the joy of harvest, or of those who divide the spoil; and abundantly recompense us for all our godly sorrow, self-denial, diligence, losses, and persecutions for the Lord's sake; for if he hath delivered us from the slavery of sin and Satan, he will at length rescue us from the yoke and scourge of every oppressor. Our chief conflict must be with our own sins; and in this warfare we may hope to obtain more splendid victories than any conqueror ever did in his bloody contests; for the influences of divine grace will daily weaken our lusts; even fiery trials and afflictions shall concur in securing our victory; and every advantage will be an earnest of our eternal triumphs, when made "more than conquerors "through him who loved us." But all our hopes and joys originate from the incarnate Redeemer: for us and our salvation he became "a Child born, a Son given," that he might be the propitiation for our sins: for us he obeyed, suffered, and died; for us he arose, ascended, reigns, and intercedes, in our behalf: "all power is given "to him in heaven and earth." Let us adore the wonders of his person, character, and love; and learn in every thing to seek and follow his counsel, as well as to obey his command. We may indeed safely intrust our souls in his hand, for he is "the mighty God," and if, from him as "the everlasting Father," we receive spiritual life, and bear his image, and are counted to him for a generation, we shall certainly enjoy that peace which he purchased and bestows; and shall learn, as the subjects of the Prince of peace, to be peaceable and peace-makers, and to seek the peace of the church and of the world. Let us then pray without ceasing, that his government and peace may increase in our hearts and in the world, until they prevail against all opposition, and make all things subject unto them. And no doubt this will be the case: for the zeal of the LORD of hosts will surely perform whatever relates to the execution of his purposes, the ruin of his enemies, the prevalence of his cause, and the salvation of his people.

V. 3—21.

The words of terror which God hath spoken, will as surely be performed as those of his love; and they often light with dreadful efficacy upon his professing people: for they who will not trust and serve him as a God of mercy, must know him as a God to whom vengeance belongeth. That pride and stoutness of heart, which render numbers fearless of consequences, and induce them to despise rebukes and warnings, and to flatter themselves and each other with the hopes of impunity and prosperity in sin, will hasten and aggravate their destruction: and unless the afflicted turn to him that smiteth them, and humbly seek his mercy, "his anger will not be turned away, but his hand will be "stretched out still;" and temporal calamities will only prove an earnest of eternal misery. Even the ancient and honourable will thus perish, if they continue in sin: but the false teachers, who for filthy lucre's sake promise them peace, will be marked with peculiar contempt and detestation. Yet how common is it for the leaders of the people to cause them to err, and for the blind to lead the blind, till they fall together into the pit of destruction! The righteous Lord can take no pleasure in the workers of iniquity, however they may be distinguished: if they, who are young in years, be old in wickedness, they may expect the more speedy punishment: nor will he spare the impenitent, however otherwise entitled to commiseration. Hypocrisy or impiety commonly connects with dishonesty and deceitful insinuation; and when these become general, they mark a people ripe for destruction. For this is a fire which will consume all before it. The vengeance of God is frequently executed on men by means of their own iniquities: and in times of public calamity, the rich and noble are only distinguished from the poor, as the lofty cedars are from the briers and thorns, when the whole forest is destroyed by one general conflagration. But all that can be suffered on earth from the anger of the Lord is but a shadow of the wrath to come: and the enraged and furious discord to which men have sometimes been given up when suffering for their sins, to the increase of their own and each other's torment, suggests to the mind a horrid idea of the misery of the wicked in another world; when, bereft of all hope and comfort, and enduring the fiery wrath of God, every one will be tormented by his own conscience, and express without restraint all his malignant passions; and so enhance the anguish and vexation of his fellow-sufferers. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ, who delivereth us from the wrath to come!

NOTES.

CHAP. X. V. 1—4. These verses belong to the subject of the preceding chapter: yet they are so expressed as to include the rulers and magistrates of the Jews, as well as those in Israel; and indeed those of every nation who thus abuse their authority. The persons intended enacted laws which authorized grievous oppression, and decided causes in the most iniquitous manner; and their edicts and decrees were enrolled by the scribes and writers, and prescribed for rules and precedents in the inferior courts. Thus the poor were robbed, and the orphans and widows plundered of their little property, under colour of law and justice. The Lord, indeed, still acknowledged the Israelites as his people. He had yet a small remnant, especially among the poor, who were peculiarly exposed to these oppressions. But he was about to send the Assyrians from afar to execute his vengeance, and what would they do in those desolations? whither would they flee for safety? or to whose keeping would they commit their ill-gotten riches, in which they gloried, and with which they then lived in splendour and luxury? (Marg. Ref.) For the Lord would certainly withdraw his protection: and then the very prisoners, or men who had been mortally wounded and left among the slain, would prevail against them. These strong expressions denote how easily and certainly they would be ruined, by the continued anger and powerful vengeance of God.

V. 5, 6. The prophet here enters upon another subject: and some think that this prediction was delivered after the ruin of Samaria, in the reign of Hezekiah; because Sennacherib is introduced, boasting of what he had done to that city. But it is more probable that this also was spoken prophetically, as what the Lord foreknew he would say, when marching against Jerusalem: and perhaps this prophecy was delivered, when Ahaz was depending on the assistance of the king of Assyria; both to warn the people of their danger from that quarter, and to encourage them to place their confidence in God. He here pointed out the Assyrian king, as the rod with which he meant to correct his offending people; and his righteous indignation was the staff with which that prince would beat and bruise them. For God would send that fierce and insolent conqueror against a nation, professedly his worshippers, but generally ungodly, and which in general would comply with Hezekiah's reformation, in a hypocritical manner. And he would commission him to take the spoil and prey, and to debase and trample upon them as if they were the very mire of the streets.

V. 7. Though the Lord would give Sennacherib power and success, and use him as his instrument in the work; yet Sennacherib would not do it, because the Lord commanded him, or as his willing servant. He had no intention or inclination of that kind: but was actuated entirely by enormous ambition, rapacity, and cruelty. 'Here is 'declared the difference of the work of God, and of the 'wicked, in one very thing and act, for God's intention is 'to chastise them for their amendment; and the Assyrians, 'is to destroy them, and enrich themselves: thus, in re-'spect of God's judgment, it is God's work; but, in re-'spect of their malice, it is the work of the devil.' (Note, Gen. l. 20.)

V. 8—11. (Notes, 2 Kings, xviii. xix.) Sennacherib proudly deemed his vassals or tributaries altogether equal to other kings, as it was common at that time for a conqueror to be styled king of kings. He had subjected one kingdom after another, and none of their deities had been able to defend them against him, (Marg. Ref.); yet their images were more splendid than any to be found in Jerusalem: he therefore supposed that he should easily master that city and her idols; either numbering JEHOVAH among them, or utterly disregarding him. Shalmanesar took and destroyed Samaria; but probably Sennacherib had some share in the victory, the whole honour of which he arrogated to himself.

V. 13, 14. This haughty conqueror supposed that his success was wholly owing to the number and valour of his troops, and to his own conduct and courage. The taking and plundering of cities was to him like gathering eggs, when the timorous bird hath flown away and left them: and so sure and easy was his success, that no one even dared to interrupt him, or to complain of him, or so much as to come and see what was going forward.

V. 15. These animated interrogations have a peculiar energy. JEHOVAH as much employed the power given to Sennacherib for certain purposes, as a man does a tool that he hath formed for that use. But could an axe be conceived to glory over him that hewed with it? or a saw to menace him that moved it? or a rod him that corrected another with it? or a staff, as if it were not mere wood, to strike him that used it? The absurdity in these instances would not be greater, than it was for Sennacherib to vaunt himself against JEHOVAH; on whom he was far more dependent, and to whom he was vastly more inferior, than the axe or the saw to him who used them. Yet, ignorant of him by whom he moved, and forgetful of his own weakness, he defied the God of Israel, and expected to overcome him!

V. 16—19. To convince the proud worm of his madness, and to promote his own glory, the Lord determined to enfeeble his overgrown power and prosperity, and to consume his stoutest commanders and forces, and all that in which he gloried. For the holy Protector and Light of Israel, would be a fire to destroy his army, as briers and thorns; and he would level them to the ground, as a conflagration does the forest and the crop of corn; yea, he would destroy them, both soul and body, absolutely and finally; and the desolations would be, as "when a standard-"bearer fainteth," and all who followed his standard are put to confusion, and cut in pieces. So that the few men that should remain of that army, which had been numerous as the trees in a vast forest, might be numbered and registered even by a child. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 20. The Jews and Israelites were wont to rely on the assistance of the neighbouring nations, and they were corrected by them one after another. Under Ahaz they sought the protection of the Assyrians, who were employed to smite them. But a remnant of those who escaped Sennacherib's ravages, by the miraculous interposition of God, could be cured of this propensity, and learn in truth to rely on the Holy One of Israel; for they would not only return to their habitations, from which the invaders had driven them, but to the worship and service of God.

V. 21—23. The original of "a remnant shall return," is Shear-Jashub, the name given to one of Isaiah's sons, in confirmation of the perpetuity of God's promises. (Note, vii. 3.) The descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, according to the promises of God, were indeed numerous as the sand of the sea: yet in general they had forsaken him, and no more than a remnant, even on this great occasion, would return to him. Not only did Sennacherib execute vengeance on many of the people; but further judgments were decreed and predicted, which in strict and awful justice would make them desolate for their sins; for the Lord had determined to make a consumption of the people throughout the land. The use which the apostle makes of this passage, shows that the Holy Spirit intended also to foretell more important events; even the conversion of a remnant of the Jews to Christ, and the execution of righteous vengeance upon the bulk of the nation that rejected him. (Notes, xxviii. 21, 22. Dan. ix. 24—27. Rom. ix. 27, 28.)

'Jews, in whom God would fulfil the promises made to their 'fathers.' (Rom. xi. 23.) (Lowth.) The inhabitants of Judea seem to have suffered very grievous things from the invaders, while Jerusalem and those who took shelter there, were preserved. Sennacherib and the Assyrians, (after the manner of Pharaoh and the Egyptians,) threatened the entire destruction of Israel; but in a very short time it would appear that the Lord's anger against his people was turned away, by the destruction of their enemies; in the same manner that he destroyed the Midianitish oppressors by the enfeebled Israelites, and as he overwhelmed Pharaoh and the Egyptians in the Red Sea. V. 28—34. These verses contain a prophetical description of Sennacherib's march towards Jerusalem, when he desolated all before him, and threatened that city with immediate destruction. The consternation and flight of the inhabitants of the cities near to Jerusalem, is also represented in a very animated and high manner. But when he was almost come to the walls of the city, and shook his hand against the daughter of Zion, as menacing her destruction, with a special enmity to the temple and the worship there performed; the Lord, in whom Hezekiah trusted, lopped off the spreading branches of this cedar with dreadful terror: he slew by a mighty one, an angel of his strength, all his valiant captains; and he cut down a hundred and eighty-five thousand of his soldiers, like the hewing down of a forest. And thus his army, which appeared as Lebanon, fell at once, to the confusion of their haughty leader, and the grateful and triumphant joy of Hezekiah and his people.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—19.

Injustice and oppression are most atrocious when sanctioned or prescribed by law; and a tremendous wo is denounced against all those who enact iniquitous statutes, or decree injustice from the seat of the magistrate. The more indigent and destitute the persons are who are thus robbed, the deeper is the guilt of their oppressors; and when persecution for righteousness' sake is added, it speedily fills up the measure of national guilt. Even in temporal calamities tyrants and persecutors will not know how to secure that power, pomp, or affluence, which they account their glory; or even their own lives: and if the Lord withdraw his protection, the most despicable instruments will execute deserved vengeance on them. But what will sinners do? whither will they flee? and what will their glory avail them in the approaching day of judgment?—When the Lord intends to desolate nations, or to chastise his people, he sometimes arms with power and renders successful, the vilest of men; and commissions them to smite those who have provoked his anger. He means to destroy the most criminal, and to excite others to repentance: but the instruments seek not his glory but their own, and count it their pleasure to destroy, and to cut off nations not a few. The lust of dominion renders them callous to the feelings of humanity, and forgetful that they are the creatures and subjects of the Almighty; authority, power, and success inflate their minds with increasing arrogance; and whilst they ascribe all their achievements to their own prowess and conduct, they suppose that nothing can stop their progress; nay, they can be so infatuated, as to "exalt themselves above all that is called God and is "worshipped;" and to suppose themselves able to overcome the deities, as well as the kings, of opposing nations! How lamentable was it, that Jerusalem, which was single and unrivalled in her relation to JEHOVAH, should have set up graven images, in which she was excelled by the heathen cities! and it is equally foolish for Christians to emulate the people of the world in those vanities, in which they will always be eclipsed. The Lord allots to every man his part, in fulfilling his grand designs. When any one serves him humbly and willingly, He graciously recompenses his faith and obedience: but they who unintentionally perform his purposes, are influenced by corrupt motives, and will be punished for their sins. Men's words and works are the fruit of their hearts, whether they be good or bad; and those high looks, which are admired as full of dignity and glory, being the fruit of a stout heart, will expose a man to divine judgments. When mighty conquerors are cut off in the very crisis of their success, the event often occasions various speculations: but in fact they have done their whole work, and are ripe for divine vengeance, and therefore the Lord stops their career: and this hath often taken place when they have been glorying in success, and anticipating fresh triumphs! Such overgrown murderers, robbers, and scourges of mankind, think the horrors and miseries of war mere pastime: they act as if the wealth of the world were created for them alone, and as if every man deserved death who was not willing to be their slave; and we need not wonder that the lives of thousands are so vile in their esteem; when the God, in whom they live and move, and from whom they have all their power and success, is despised by them. Instead of his instruments, they affect to be his rivals; and forgetful how easily he can crush them, they set themselves against him. But when the Lord of Hosts is pleased to repress their insolence, he can soon thin their ranks, either by the sword of an enemy, or by famine and pestilence. And the Light of Israel will be a fire to consume all the dignity, prosperity, and multitude of the workers of iniquity, both soul and body. Some few indeed escape the most tremendous temporal judgments; but not one impenitent sinner will escape the wrath to come. Then even the standard-bearers of infidelity and impiety will utterly faint, and doubtless all their legions will be driven into darkness.

V. 20—34.

Scarcely in any age is there more than a remnant who stay upon the Holy One of Israel in truth. Most professed Christians still cleave to sin and stay themselves on the world, though often troubled and injured by it: but blessed be God, that there is a remnant who return to Him; may we be found of that happy number! Then, whilst we expect his righteous judgments, according to his word, to overflow the profane and hypocritical multitudes, we may dwell in Zion, fearless of every enemy and catastrophe: nay, even the corrections which we receive by the hands of wicked men, who are the rod of our Father, will ere long cease in the execution of his indignation on them for their crimes. All former judgments on proud oppressors were only specimens of the final ruin reserved for the enemies of God. Because of the anointing of our great Redeemer, the yoke of every antichrist must be broken from off his church: and if our souls partake of the unction of his Holy Spirit, our complete and eternal deliverance is ensured to us. In the mean time, whilst our enemies defy the daughter of Zion, and seem to make swift progress in their attempts against her; let us not yield to unbelieving fears. The Lord, in his own time, by his own hand, or by some instrument endued with power from on high, will bring down his most exalted and haughty enemies; and all opposition shall fall before him, and his cause shall finally prevail and triumph.

NOTES.

CHAP. XI. V. 1. The transition from the temporal deliverances of Israel, to that spiritual redemption from which they all originated, is very common in the prophetical writings. Sennacherib's chieftains and army were like the unnumbered stately cedars of Lebanon; but speedily cut down by a mighty one. But the extraordinary person here predicted, would resemble a tender shoot from the root of a tree that had been cut down, and yet he arrived at the highest exaltation. (liii. 2.) Some think that the prophecy had reference to Hezekiah or Zerubbabel, as types of Christ. But Hezekiah was born long before it was delivered: and there was nothing in the state of the Jews under Zerubbabel, answerable to the glorious things spoken in the sequel of this chapter: so that it must be entirely a prophecy of Christ, and can accord to no other. (Note, liii. 2, 3. Rev. xxii. 16.)—The prophet spake of the Messiah, as springing from the root of Jesse, rather than from that of David; because Jesse lived and died in a private station; but David was a prosperous monarch: and when all the glory of his family seemed to be like the withered trunk or decaying stump of a tree, a tender shoot or rod would spring forth, in which that glory would revive, increase, and be established for ever; and which would indeed become a Plant of renown. V. 2—5. As the human nature of Christ was formed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, in the womb of the virgin; so all his power, wisdom, and holiness, as man, are in the New Testament ascribed to the same divine influence; for "the Holy Spirit was not given by measure unto him." The varied expressions here used, donote the manifold endowments of the human nature of Christ for the work which he had undertaken, and the fulness treasured up in him for his people. Every kind of divine knowledge and sagacity, of wisdom and prudence, of piety and boldness, of holy affections and spiritual relish for heavenly things, of vigour and strength of mind for obedience; and suffering with unabated courage, zeal, and patience; whatever was requisite for the exercise of his personal ministry attended with singular miracles on earth, or for that of his mediatorial kingdom in Heaven, to the end of time, are comprised in the expressions before us. So perfect would be his knowledge, wisdom, and justice, that he would in no case judge by appearances or report; but would distinguish characters and decide causes with the most exact discernment and impartiality. He would be the Protector of his poor and humble people, and plead for them against oppressors: and whilst he saved all those who submitted to him, he would destroy the enemies of his kingdom, by denouncing and executing vengeance upon them: as if an iron rod proceeded from his mouth to dash them in pieces, or as if his breath were a flame of fire to devour them: and his most perfect righteousness and faithfulness would both establish him on the throne, prepare him for it, and be the ornament and glory of it. (Notes, Ps. lxxii. Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—9. (Notes, ix. 6, 7.) The effects of divine grace on the minds of men, in the times of the Messiah, are here represented with much beauty under the most significant emblems. Persons of the most dissimilar dispositions and pursuits, and addicted to various kinds of wickedness, would be so changed by the grace of the Gospel, that they would become of "one heart and of one way." The selfish, the penurious, the rapacious, the contentious, the ambitious, the savage, the subtle, and the malicious, would lose their peculiar base dispositions, and become harmless, sincere, peaceable, benevolent, and affectionate; they would live together in harmony, hearken to instruction, and be guided by gentle persuasions and entreaties. So that the change would be as evident, and surprising, as if the wolf, the tiger, the lion, the bear, and other fierce carnivorous animals, should learn to be as gentle and harmless as the lamb, the kid, the calf, or the cow; to associate with them, to graze the pasture as they do, or to feed on straw or hay; and should be so tractable that a little child could lead them. Or, as if the asp or the cockatrice should no longer be disposed to bite with envenomed teeth; but should be so inoffensive, that infants might safely play by their holes: for there would be no more a disposition in the inhabitants of Zion, the true church of Christ, to hurt or destroy; the knowledge of the Lord, with all its sanctifying effects, should at length cover the whole earth, even as the waters cover the sea. The fables and imaginations of the Gentiles, of a golden age, and the return of it in the latter days, seem to have been taken from the scriptural account of Adam in paradise, and from the predictions of the Messiah's happy reign. To suppose that the Holy Spirit, by this decisive language, foretold events no way answerable to their exact meaning; and that they are merely highly-wrought figures of speech, like those of uninspired eastern poets; and suited to raise expectations in simple hearted believers, which must be eternally disappointed, savours too much of infidelity, not to say blasphemy, to deserve a serious refutation. The earth has never yet been "full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea;" and therefore the grand accomplishment of the prophecy has not yet taken place.

V. 10. When the Gospel began to be publicly preached and embraced, the divine Saviour, as springing from the root of Jesse, and as crucified for sinners, ascended into heaven, and exalted into the mediatorial throne, stood as an ensign to which the people of God resorted. (Marg. Ref.) The Gentiles sought to him as their Lord and Saviour; and the rest of soul, which they found by trusting in him, was connected with the glory and beauty of holiness, and an earnest of the glory of heaven. (Rom. xv. 12.) Or, rather, the Saviour would rest with full complacency in his redeemed people, chiefly from the Gentiles, in whom his name would be exceedingly glorified. (Ps. cxxxii. 8, 13.)

V. 11—16. The Lord recovered a remnant of his people from Assyria and Babylon, by the same power with which he had brought the whole nation out of Egypt: and it is here predicted, that he would "set his hand again "the second time," to gather those that would be left of them from all nations whither they were scattered; and several of the adjacent countries, and some very distant ones are specified. The crucified Saviour, doubtless, as held forth in the preached Gospel, is that ensign to which he will assemble the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah, from the four corners of the earth. United in dependence on, and obedience to, the Prince of Peace, that envy, competition, and enmity, which so long kept the Jews and Israelites at variance, shall be finally terminated, their adversaries shall be cut off, and many of their former enemies shall become tributary and obedient to them. For the Lord will then remove all obstacles by the same powerful interposition, that he vouchsafed in behalf of Israel, when he separated the Tongue, or Bay of the Egyptian, or Red Sea, and destroyed that hinderance to their departure: and with a mighty wind he will so separate the waters of the river, (Euphrates,) in all its streams, that men may pass over dry shod. Thus an high way shall be made for Israel's return, as there was for their ancestors to pass from Egypt unto Canaan. 'This part of the chapter contains a prophecy, which certainly remains yet to 'be accomplished!' (Bp. Lowth.) 'This chapter contains a general prophecy of the advancement Christ's 'kingdom should make in the world. And I take this 'part of the chapter to foretel those glorious times of the 'Church, which shall be ushered in by the restoration of 'the Jewish nation; when they shall embrace the Gospel, 'and be restored to their own country from the several 'dispersions where they are scattered. This remarkable 'scene of Providence is plainly foretold by most of the prophets of the Old Testament, and by St. Paul.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—9.

The descent from the summit of earthly grandeur to the abyss of misery is common. But heavenly honour and prosperity advance gradually from small beginnings, and will increase for ever: and the cause of God is not rendered triumphant by human power, but by the Spirit of the Lord. Thus the great Head of the Church sprang up as a tender shoot; and was scarcely observed at first, or but observed to be disdained: but through his external meanness, when in the form of a servant, a divine glory shone forth. His holy life, his stupendous miracles, his boundless knowledge and heavenly wisdom, and all his words and works, proclaimed that "the Spirit of the LORD "rested upon him," for all the purposes predicted by his holy prophet. And now in human nature he reigns upon a glorious throne, the Lord and Judge of his church and of the world; and all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, of grace and truth, of power and might, yea, all the fulness of the Godhead dwell in him. Thus gloriously exalted, and furnished for his station, he is the Patron of the poor and oppressed; for the lowly and broken-hearted alone truly submit to him and value his salvation: and whilst he pleads their cause, he will execute his severest threatenings on all the workers of iniquity; but with exact discrimination and strict justice, for "righteous-"ness is the girdle of his loins, and faithfulness of his "reins." "From his fulness all" his people "receive, "and grace for grace:" So that the same Spirit is communicated to each of them in their measure: and thus they learn sound wisdom and discretion; they become acquainted with God and themselves, with his truths and their own duty, interests, dangers, and security; they are rendered prudent to shun, or strong to resist, the temptations of Satan; they learn to fear and love the Lord; and with increasing experience and spirituality, they become of quick understanding in discerning good and evil: they are formed to the same judgment with him, whose Spirit they receive; they learn to follow his example of goodness, truth, and purity; and in a subordinate sense, righteousness and faithfulness become their girdle also. Let us seek diligently for more and more of this heavenly wisdom and good understanding, and be contented to want that knowledge and discernment which the world admires and idolizes. As far as we are taught by the Spirit of Christ, the predominant obliquities of our natural disposition will be corrected; and those hateful and mischievous vices, by which men resemble the most pernicious of the animals in their worst qualities, will be mortified; and we shall be rendered harmless, peaceable, sincere, kind, liberal, and ready to renounce our own interest or pleasure, in order to do good to others. For the grace of Christ is a sovereign remedy for every one of our mental disorders; and though none of them are here perfectly cured, all of them are brought under, and no one habitually prevails; but the believer's desires, pleasures, and leading aims are totally changed; and thus they who before conversion were of the most opposite characters, now assimilate to each other, and learn to concur in the same purposes and endeavours. Every one of them becomes teachable and forgiving: they no longer are disposed to hurt, or destroy, or deceive; but they learn to forgive, their hearts are enlarged, and they become the friends of mankind, because they are the redeemed servants of Jesus Christ. But, alas, how many professors of evangelical truth, by their avarice, contention, pride, and ferocity, evince, that they are strangers to such a gracious change; and that they still continue wolves, tigers, or serpents, and not lambs and doves! How many leave the matter doubtful both to themselves and others, and often disgrace that doctrine which they should adorn! How little has this tendency of the Gospel yet appeared in the world! We cannot then entertain a doubt, but that more conspicuous and glorious effects are to be expected; when "the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the LORD, "as the waters cover the sea;" when wars and furious contests shall cease, and all nations shall know the power of the Gospel, to teach men to love one another. In the mean time let us aim to manifest it in our narrow circle, as far as we are able; that our example and endeavours may in some feeble measure help to promote the honour of Christ, and to stop the mouths of gainsayers. And as Christians seldom do much good by engaging the enemies of the Gospel, in a way of disputatious reasoning: let us all aim to convince men by the powerful rhetoric of a holy useful life, that ours is the true doctrine of the word of God.

V. 10—16.

As professing the Christian religion, we are enlisted under the standard of the cross of Christ; that by our profession of his truth, our good works, and our fervent prayers, we may obtain peaceful conquests over our enemies, by winning them over to our side. Of old this banner was displayed, and both Jews and Gentiles sought to it, and found a glorious rest to their souls, by trusting and obeying the King of saints. For us the same ensign is erected; may we also thankfully flock to it, and share these blessings. And whilst we expect the Lord to set to his hand again, to gather his ancient people from their dispersion, and to bring them home to his church; and also to bring in the fulness of the Gentiles, when all parties will cease their envy and strife, and be united in holy love: let us trust in his glorious power to remove out of the way all the hinderances to our complete salvation; let us tread in the highway of holiness which he hath made for his redeemed; let us wait for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life; and let us expect that the Lord will prepare our way through death, that river which separates this from the eternal world, that we may pass over dry shod; even as he dried up the Red Sea and Jordan, when "he led "forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness, "to give them the land of Canaan for their inheritance."

NOTES.

CHAP. XII. V. 1. Whatever accommodations may be made of this sacred hymn, as it is immediately connected with the prophecy in the former chapter, it evidently predicts, that the converted nation of Israel, reflecting upon their past condition for so long a time, because of the anger of God against them for their obstinate rejection of their Messiah; and exulting in the glorious change, that had taken place, shall break out in the language of the prophet, "O LORD I will praise thee, &c." "I will give thanks unto thee, O JEHOVAH, for though "thou hast been angry with me, thine anger is turned "away, and thou hast comforted me." (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 2. The deliverance of Israel from oppression and misery, was a shadow of the redemption of the church from sin and Satan. This whole salvation results from the infinite love and mercy of God the Father; was contrived by his infinite wisdom, and rests on his infinite power and truth. It is altogether communicated through the person and mediation of Immanuel. And it is applied by the new-creating power of God the Spirit. So that in every sense God is the Salvation of his church. Thus JAH-JEHOVAH, the eternal God, is in Christ the Support, Protector, and Friend of the Church and of every believer; and is become his Salvation, from the moment when he is enabled to receive, and rely on him, as such.

V. 3. The purifying, fertilizing, and consolatory influences of the Holy Spirit, are commonly denoted under the emblem of springing water; (Marg. Ref.) This water flows through the mediatory work of Christ, and is conveyed to our souls by means of the ordinances of God's worship. When the Gospel is preached in any place, a well of salvation is opened, which communicates with the Fountain of life in Christ: and in the predicted times, this Fountain of life and these wells of salvation, though long hidden from Israel, will be discovered to them, and they will praise God with joyful hearts. 'The Jews themselves 'seem to have applied this to the times of the Messiah. 'On the last day of the feast of tabernacles, they fetched 'water in a golden pitcher, from the fountain of Shiloah, 'and poured it, mixed with wine, on the sacrifice as it 'lay upon the altar, with great rejoicing. Our Saviour 'applied the ceremony, and the intention of it, to himself, 'and to the effusion of the Holy Spirit, promised, and to 'be given by him.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 4—6. In the day when the Lord shall do such great things for his church; his people shall excite each other to praise him for the past, and to call upon him for all that yet remains to be done: or they will proclaim his name and perfections, as well as declare his doings among the people, and expatiate on his wonders wrought in their behalf, that his name may be exalted. Thus the excellent things done to the Jews, being celebrated and made known to all the earth, will probably be one grand mean of bringing in the fulness of the Gentiles: whilst the inhabitants of Zion, the church of converted Jews, will cry aloud and shout for joy; and all shall see the triumphant power of the Holy One of Israel, in the wonders wrought in their behalf.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every one of those who now have peace with God, was once exposed to his righteous anger; and most of them experienced many painful effects from it, and dreaded such as were far more tremendous. But when the awakened and humbled sinner finds pardon and peace through the atoning blood of Christ, he with thankful heart exclaims, "O LORD, I will praise thee, though thou wast "angry with me, thine anger is turned away, and thou "hast comforted me." But, alas! we are prone to relapse into transgression; and then our heavenly Father is angry with us and frowns upon us; he bereaves us of our comforts and inflicts sharp corrections. When these bring us to mourn for our sins, and to renew repentance and humble faith, his anger will be turned away, our comforts will be restored, and our hearts again tuned to celebrate his praises. All these our hopes and comforts are vouchsafed to us sinful creatures, because "God is become our Sal-"vation:" and when we rest all our hope on this Foundation, "we may trust, and not be afraid." For as God was manifested in the flesh; as Immanuel died for our sins, when we were enemies, he will doubtless be the Strength and complete Salvation of all whom he hath taught to believe in, love, and obey him, and whom he now numbers amongst his friends. Having JEHOVAH, the eternal God, for our Strength and Song, we may bid defiance to all our enemies: and though we must encounter difficulties, endure hardships, and experience many sharp conflicts: we have wells of salvation opened on every side; and, drawing from them the waters of life and consolation, by faith and prayer, we may rejoice in the midst of tribulation and find some foretastes of heaven, in communion with the Lord in this outward sanctuary. The more diligently we attend on the means of grace; and the larger supplies we derive from the Fountain of salvation; the more fervent will be our praises of God our Saviour. The glories of his character and the excellency of all his wonderful works, especially that of our redemption, will be our favourite theme: We shall ardently desire that his name should be universally extolled; and that his precious salvation should be known to all the earth. Whilst our hearts rejoice that the Holy God dwelleth in Zion upon a mercy-seat, the Friend of sinners who seek unto him, and the almighty Protection of his church, we shall be ready to shout for joy as victors, even when we are fighting the good fight of faith: and we shall not only anticipate our own complete salvation, and that of every believer, through him who loved us; but the prevalence also of his truth and cause over all opposition: whilst numerous accessions will be made continually to those who celebrate his praises with joyful hearts; and every one shall, with increasing alacrity, seek to recommend his salvation and service to all around him.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIII. V. 1. The word rendered burden, (though some translate it the oracle,) seems to denote the heavy vengeance predicted; which was seen in vision by the prophet, as if already falling upon Babylon. (Note, Jer. xxiii. 33—40.) 'These two chapters, (striking off 'the last verses of the latter,) contain one entire pro-'phecy, foretelling the destruction of Babylon by the 'Medes and Persians, delivered probably in the reign of 'Ahaz, about two hundred years before the completion of 'it. The captivity itself of the Jews at Babylon, (which 'the prophet does not expressly foretel, but supposes, in 'the spirit of prophecy, as what was actually to be ef-'fected;) did not fully take place till about one hundred 'and thirty years after the delivery of this prophecy: and 'the Medes, who are expressly mentioned (17,) as the 'principal agents in the overthrow of the Babylonish 'monarchy, by which the Jews were released from that 'captivity, were at this time an inconsiderable people; 'having been in a state of anarchy ever since the fall of 'the great Assyrian empire, of which they had made a 'part under Sardanapalus; and did not become a people 'under Deioces till about the seventeenth of Hezekiah.' (Bp. Lowth.) The Jews had hitherto had little acquaintance with the Chaldeans; that empire was, at the time when this prophecy was uttered, inferior to that of the Assyrians, if it did not constitute a part of it; and it was several years after, that the kings of Babylon obtained the ascendency, and their empire supplanted and swallowed up that of the Assyrians. Some intimations, however, had been given the Jews of their danger from that quarter; and indeed all the predictions of the prophets, concerning foreign nations, were given with some reference to the state of the Jews, and with an especial regard to their advantage. 'Babylon was a type or figure of Antichrist, 'the great oppressor of God's church in after times.— 'These prophecies have an aspect beyond the taking of 'Babylon by Cyrus; inasmuch as the prophets describe 'this judgment as a decisive stroke, that should thoroughly 'vindicate the cause of oppressed truth and innocence: 'and put a final period to idolatry, and to all the miseries 'and oppressions of God's people.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2—5. The Lord, by his prophet, addressed himself to the rulers of the Medes and Persians, as if present, commanding them, by every means, to collect forces, and to go and take possession of Babylon, and of the stately palaces of her nobles. He called them, "his sanctified "ones:" 'those whom I have appointed and set apart for 'that service.' (Lowth.) He had selected them and endued them with power to execute his indignation; and he knew, that they would rejoice in doing those things, by which his name would even finally be magnified. (Note, Ezra i.) When the Lord should thus muster the host for the battle, vast multitudes from distant nations would soon be collected, with tumultuous noise, to destroy the whole kingdom of the Babylonians. This exactly accords to the account given by historians of the various nations which constituted the army of Cyrus.

V. 6. The Almighty; 'Whose power and purposes 'none is able to resist.' (Lowth.)

V. 8. As flames. That is, pale, and livid, as terror renders man; for this is the colour of the flame: not red, as with anger, which is the colour of the fire, from which the flame proceeds. (Marg. Ref.) After many defeats in the open field, the king of Babylon retired with his forces within the walls of his capital: and Cyrus formed the siege of that city, and beyond all expectation took it, by draining off the waters of the Euphrates, and marching his army into the city by the channel of that river. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. The prophets, under these figures, describe the subversion of governments, when kings, nobles, and rulers are degraded or destroyed; and that confusion, horror, and dismay, which attend such violent convulsions. The grandeur of the images, and the sublimity of the language, in these chapters, have greatly excited the admiration of the most competent judges.

V. 11. The world. The Babylonish empire, at one time the largest in the universe, was, it seems, called the world; as the Roman empire was in after ages. (Luke ii. 1.)

V. 13—15. The governors and state of Babylon would be entirely subverted, as if the heavens and the earth were shaken out of their place; the vanquished armies of the Chaldeans would be pursued as a hunted roe, and scattered like lost sheep; their allies would retire in dismay to their several cities; every one who was overtaken would be slain without mercy; and all who united to make a stand, would be speedily cut to pieces; or, all the associates of Babylon should share her fate.

(Note, 1.) Xenophon makes Cyrus open a speech to his army in this manner, 'Ye 'Medes, and others who now hear me, I well know, that 'ye have not accompanied me in this expedition with a 'view of acquiring wealth.'

V. 18. This does seem to have been the case, when Cyrus took Babylon: but the prophecy then began to be fulfilled; and all the several particulars were accomplished in the subsequent desolations.

V. 19—22. The vast extent of Babylon, its stupendous walls and gates, and its magnificent buildings and decorations, are celebrated by ancient writers above those of any other city in the world. But after it was taken by Cyrus it began to decline, and soon ceased to be the seat of empire; then its population decreased; at length it was utterly deserted; and the desolate buildings were long the resort of every species of wild beasts and venomous reptiles, so that it was dangerous for travellers to approach them: at length, it was so entirely wasted away, that no remains of it could be found; and, strange to tell, it cannot at present be exactly ascertained where this renowned city stood! As the walls and buildings were formed of brick not very skilfully prepared; perhaps this might conduce to the utter decay of its ruins: but when God is pleased to destroy, nothing can withstand his power. (Notes, Rev. xviii.) 'It is uncertain what creatures are meant by 'several of these Hebrew words; particularly what the 'word searim signifies, which we render satyrs. The 'word originally signifies goats: and it is supposed, that 'evil spirits of old time appeared in the shape of goats, 'upon which account it is sometimes translated devils.' (Note, Lev. xvii. 3—7.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The threatenings of Scripture press with incumbent weight upon the head of the wicked, and are a sore burden too heavy for them to bear: and at the appointed time they will sink the most flourishing cities and nations into ruin, as well as the souls of sinners into eternal misery. But the believer sees this tremendous vengeance ready to fall on those who are not aware of their own danger: and whilst he would affectionately warn them to escape from it, he becomes the object of their derision, or indignation. The Lord selects and sets apart the weapons of his wrath, who are of themselves disposed to the work in which he purposes to employ them; and whilst they rejoice in gratifying their selfish passions, they unintentionally perform his righteous judgments. He invests them with power, affords them favourable opportunities, gives them helpers, and endues them with intrepidity; and thus "the Lord "of hosts mustereth the hosts of the battle:" with furious tumult they march from the ends of the earth, to assault their enemies, and they are not aware that they are only the weapons of his indignation. He also gives them success; and when his day of taking vengeance arrives, the most valiant warriors become feeble, numerous armies melt away, and all resistance is heartless and useless. But the compass of nature cannot furnish images fully to illustrate the horror and dismay, the amazement and despair, which will come upon the wicked, when the day of the LORD, which is near at hand "shall come, as a destruc-"tion from the Almighty." Then indeed all hands shall be faint, and the hearts of sinners shall melt; they shall look with astonishment one at another, and their ghastly countenances shall correspond with their inward anguish. For that day will indeed be "terrible with wrath and fierce "anger, to lay the earth desolate, and to destroy the sin-"ners thereof out of it:" then the stars shall not give their light, and the sun and the moon shall be extinguished: "the LORD will punish the world for their evil, and the "wicked for their iniquity; and cause the arrogancy of "the proud to cease:" nay, the heavens and the earth shall pass away, and no place be found for them. In that day all these emphatical expressions, which are here used as bold metaphors, shall be found too feeble to express the least part of the tremendous scene: nor will there be any place for the sinner to flee unto, or any method by which he may attempt an escape. Alas! few act as if they believed these things; and numbers treat the plain declarations of Scripture to this effect, with at least as much neglect and contempt, or contradiction, as we can suppose the proud monarchs and nobles of Babylon heard these predictions of poor Jewish prophets. But too late they found the truth of these despised oracles: then, neither their riches could bribe, nor the misery of the women and children soften, nor the beauty and glory of their city allure, nor its strength resist, "the weapon's of the LORD's "righteous indignation;" and Babylon became at length entirely desolated, even as Sodom and Gomorrah. Thus will the denunciations of God's word be executed on all impenitent sinners, in their full meaning: and, notwithstanding the clamours and blasphemies of his enemies, the Lord will appear glorious in justice, in their tremendous ruin; and too late they will know "whose word will "stand, His, or theirs." The fate of this proud city is both a demonstration of the truth of the Bible, an emblem of the approaching ruin of the New Testament Babylon, a warning to sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and an encouragement to believers to expect victory over every enemy of their souls, and of the church of God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIV. V. 1, 2. The ruin of Babylon was immediately connected with mercy to the Jews; and the victory of Cyrus made way for their restoration from captivity. The terms, Jacob and Israel, may imply that mercy was intended to a remnant from all the twelve tribes. Probably several proselytes were made to the Jewish religion, when they were restored to their own land: but we do not read that they ever ruled over the Chaldeans, or had any number of them for slaves. It may therefore be inferred, that still more important events were predicted: and in general all the prophecies, relating to the destruction of Babylon, have, no doubt, a typical reference to the destruction of the great Antichrist as foretold by St. John. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—6. 'The deliverance of Judah from captivity 'introduces, with the greatest ease, the triumphant song 'on that subject. A chorus of Jews is introduced, 'expressing their astonishment at the sudden downfal 'of Babylon, and the great reverse of fortune which had 'befallen the tyrant, who had oppressed his own, and 'harassed the neighbouring kingdoms.' (Bp. Lowth.) Babylon may be called "the golden city," with reference to her immense riches: or "the exactress of gold," from the rapacity of her kings. (Marg. Ref.)

9 * Hell [r] from beneath [s] is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming: it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the † chief ones of the earth: it hath raised up from their thrones all the kings of the nations.

V. 7, 8. At the destruction of this victorious and oppressive monarchy, the whole earth seemed to experience a sudden and unexpected relief, serenity, and security; and to express her joy by songs of triumph. The fir-trees and cedars mean the princes of the earth, who had seen many of their number levelled by the king of Babylon, and had trembled for themselves; but now rejoiced at his destruction, and at the peace and security thus afforded them.

V. 9—11. The scene here changes. The regions of the dead are laid open to the imagination, and their inhabitants are seen in commotion, at the approach of this proud monarch to join their company: and the mighty kings and captains, (especially they whom the kings of Babylon had destroyed,) are represented as leaving their several thrones in order to meet him: not to condole with, or to welcome, him, but to insult over him as now become like one of them; and as bereft of all his pomp, luxury, music, and mirth; whilst his poor remains on earth are become company and food for the worms. Doubtless this is a poetical description, and the imagery is taken from external objects: but we must remember, that it has truth for its basis, that the wicked remove at death to a place of misery, and that proud malignant spirits do insult and torment each other, (Luke xvi. 19—31.) 'Here follows a 'poetical description of the infernal regions, where all the 'ghosts of the deceased tyrants are represented, as rising 'out of their places, and coming to meet the king of 'Babylon. The Hebrew word sheol, which our translation renders hell or the grave, signifies the state of the 'dead in general, and is indifferently applied to the good 'and bad. Here it denotes the infernal mansions of 'deceased tyrants.' (Lowth.) The word rendered the dead, signifies giants: and Mr. Mede seems to think that the rebels of the old world, who perished in the deluge, were especially intended.

V. 12—15. The Jews here resume the discourse, and address the king of Babylon, by the title of "Lucifer, son "of the morning." He had been as the morning star, the first in dignity among the princes of the earth, but he was now fallen from heaven and utterly debased. This language may refer to the fall of Satan and his angels, as the king of Babylon greatly resembled that arch-apostate in his character and fate. The Jews, exulting in his astonishing fall, upbraid him with his vain ambition and enmity against God. He "had said in his heart, that he would ascend "into heaven, and exalt his throne above the stars of "God:" he would eclipse all earthly princes, and even rival the God of heaven; nay, he would fix his throne on mount Zion, where God's worshippers used to assemble; (Marg. Ref.) and there receive the adorations of his subjects and vanquished foes: for he would aspire to divine honours, and "ascend above the heights of the clouds, and "be like the Most High." But indeed his soul was about to sink into hell, and his body to be thrown into the pit without the accustomed rites of burial. 'The fall of the 'apostate angels is not directly recorded in the Old Testament: but it is implied in the distinction the holy writers 'make between good and evil spirits; and is sometimes 'alluded to by the prophets, when they threaten destruction to proud and insolent tyrants, who, in imitation of 'the pride of the devil, exalt themselves against God and 'his truth; and are the instruments of Satan in promoting 'idolatry and wickedness in the world. These expressions, as they allude to the rebellion of Satan, who affected to be equal with God; so they contain an exact 'description of Antichrist,—as represented by St. Paul.' (2 Thes. ii. 4.) (Lowth.)

V. 16—20. The subject is here diversified by another scene. The dead body of the king of Babylon is found, narrowly examined, and recognized, by some that had known him in his prosperity: and they express their surprise and contempt by the subsequent interrogations. Among other cruelties, they mention his severity to his captives, whom he kept in bondage and in prison without mercy, as a reason of the dreadful judgments executed upon him. Belshazzar performed no exploits answerable to the lofty terms here used; and we may thence infer, that the race of kings, which centred and terminated in him, is also meant; for this is common in prophecy.—Other kings had been buried according to their dignity, and lay quietly in their tombs: but he was deprived of burial, as an abominable branch from a detested stock; as the polluted raiment of those slain in battle, when not being worth preserving, it is crumbled into the hole with their dead bodies; or as a carcass, that is trampled under foot in contempt. His cruelty to his people, beyond the example of his predecessors, merited this treatment; and neither such evil-doers, nor their posterity, would be exempted from infamy and misery.

V. 21—23. God himself here speaks and commands the extirpation of the royal family of Babylon; that they might no more arise to possess the earth, and build cities to perpetuate their memory as they had done. For he would destroy both that family and their name, and Babylon also, from off the earth; yea, he would "sweep it "with the besom of destruction:" an expression incomparably emphatical: yet it has been fulfilled in the most extraordinary manner! The word rendered nephew, properly signifies grandson. Belshazzar was the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar: and after his death, it may well be supposed that the posterity of that great conqueror was extirpated. And when Cyrus had taken Babylon, the waters of the Euphrates were not properly reduced to their channel; so that they gradually changed the adjacent country into a marsh, or fen, full of pools of water, and an habitation for bitterns or other creatures which choose such situations: for the import of the original word is not certainly known. 'There is no poem of its kind, extant in 'any language, in which the subject is so well laid out, 'and so happily conducted, with such a richness of inven'tion, such a variety of images, persons, and distinct 'actions, with such rapidity and ease of transition, and 'in so small a compass, as in this ode of Isaiah.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 24—27. The destruction of the Assyrian army in the land of Judah, and the consequent deliverance of the Jews from Sennacherib's oppression, were an earnest and pledge of the performance of the preceding prophecy.—Some think, that the destruction of Gog and Magog, who shall "fall on the mountains of Israel," about the same time with the New-Testament-Babylon, is also predicted. (Ez. xxxviii. xxxix.)

V. 28—32. These verses form a distinct prophecy, which probably was delivered at another time. Uzziah had vanquished the Philistines; (2 Chr. xxvi. 6, 7;) but when he died, and the Jews were afterwards greatly enfeebled during the reign of Ahaz, and left in great difficulties at his death, the whole land of Philistia, and all connected with it, rejoiced. But it was predicted, that Hezekiah would be more terrible to them than Uzziah had been; as if a less destructive serpent should produce a cockatrice, or a fiery flying serpent. At that time the very poorest of the Jews would be sustained in plenty and live in safety; whilst the Lord would destroy the root of the Philistines' prosperity by famine, and employ Hezekiah to slay their remnant. Instead of rejoicing, therefore, howling would be more seasonable; for the whole land would be ruined: a smoke or cloud of dust from the north would give notice of the approach of the army of Judah from the north-west to waste them; from which none would straggle or desert, when that appointed time arrived. And if any nation should send ambassadors to make peace with the Jews, or to inquire concerning their deliverances, they might answer, that 'JEHOVAH himself had chosen and 'established Zion, as the place of his special presence and 'worship; in order that his people, when afflicted and 'distressed, might betake themselves thither for refuge; 'and thus putting themselves under his protection, they 'might be taken care of by him, though poor and destitute in themselves.'

CHAP. XV.

The beginning of the prophecy against Moab, 1—9.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—23.

The whole plan of Providence is arranged for the good of the chosen people of God, on whom he will have mercy: so that even revolutions in kingdoms conduce to the true interests of his church. His judgments on some ungodly men are made instrumental to the conversion of others, who join themselves to his people, and cleave to them in all circumstances; and the consolations of his service abundantly compensate their losses and sufferings. The Israel of God will certainly obtain a complete ascendency over all opposers, with rest from sorrow, and fear, and hard bondage; whilst all their oppressors will be reduced to the most abject slavery and contempt. The Lord now glorifies his patience in bearing with his rebellious creatures; but he will shortly glorify his power and justice in their punishment: and men shall behold with astonishment the sudden and tremendous ruin of oppressive rulers and cities, that are full of the gains of iniquity. There always have been men who gloried in using power, to gratify their rage, ambition, and cruelty, and in continued oppression. But when they are run down by others more powerful and successful than themselves, their ruin excites a general rejoicing. Speedily the most mighty and terrible of the scourges of mankind will be broken; and having here resembled in disposition the inhabitants of hell, they will there be made like them in impotency and misery; and their only distinction will then be, a degree of wrath proportioned to their abused talents, their enormous crimes, and extensive mischievousness; whilst their mutual revilings and taunts will enhance their misery. What then will all their present pomp and sensual mirth avail them? The vaster the ambition, and the higher the exaltation, of the wicked have been, the more tremendous will be their downfal. As our first parents ruined themselves by aspiring to be as gods; so the same propensity hath infected their posterity; and many proud worms have defied God, and claimed divine adoration: as if it were not sufficient to be exalted above all earthly potentates; but they really thought that they could ascend into heaven and be like the Most High! But the more of this inebriating poison they gorge, the greater is their resemblance to Satan, and the more their fall into hell will accord to the fall of that Lucifer, the son of the morning. For a while they weaken the nations, make the earth to tremble, shake kingdoms, and change the world into a wilderness, a slaughter-house, or a dungeon for the few whom they leave alive. But soon death weakens and removes them: and whilst their souls are in torment, perhaps great honour is rendered to their breathless remains: they lie in state, are sumptuously interred, and moulder in a magnificent sepulchre; whilst some mercenary wretch celebrates their exploits with infamous panegyrics! But sometimes the Lord disgraces the remains of such monsters of iniquity: and the contempt shown to those who once were renowned on earth, causes such as narrowly observe them to say, "Is this the "man, who—!" But whether honourably interred, or left as a carcass trodden under feet, such men are abominable and contemptible, and entail misery and disgrace on their posterity; for whom slaughter is prepared for the iniquity of their fathers. When God arises against the wicked, he will so crush them, that they shall rise up no more; and will sweep them from the earth "with the "besom of destruction:" and deserts, seas, and pools of water, in the places where once proud cities stood, form affecting monuments of the power of his wrath, and the truth of his word.

V. 24—32.

According to the thoughts and purposes of God, every event must take place; for who can disannul his purpose, or turn back his out-stretched arm? Wo then be to those against whom "he swears in his wrath that they shall "not enter into his rest." When one instrument of his vengeance is removed, he soon raises up another more terrible; and he easily destroys the root, as well as lops off the branches, of his enemies. They have therefore no cause to rejoice, but rather to weep and howl: for the appointed time of their complete destruction speedily and certainly approacheth. But the Lord hath founded Zion, for a refuge to poor sinners, who flee from the wrath to come, and trust in his mercy through Jesus Christ. None that humbly apply for admission into this city of our God, are excluded. There they are protected and provided for, even the poorest and vilest of them; and he hath not only ensured their salvation by his promise, but confirmed it with an oath; that they might enjoy "strong consolation, who "have fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before "them." Let us then glory in our privileges, and in our relation to the crucified Immanuel: let us always be ready to give a reason of our hope to every inquirer, of whatever rank, nation, or character: and let us inform all around us of our comforts and security, and exhort them to seek the same Refuge and Salvation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XV. V. 1. (Notes, Jer. xlviii.) 'This and 'the following chapter, taken together, make one entire 'prophecy. The time of the delivery, and consequently 'of the completion of it, which was to be in three years 'from that time, is uncertain, the former not being marked 'in the prophecy itself, nor the latter recorded in his-'tory. But the most probable account is, that it was de-'livered in the first year of Hezekiah, and accomplish-'ed in his fourth year, when Shalmaneser invaded the 'kingdom of Israel.' (Bp. Lowth.) "Surely Ar was "destroyed, and brought to silence in a night, &c." (Old Trans.) That is, suddenly, in a very short time, and not after a long siege, and with every circumstance and aggravation of terror.

V. 2. Either the king of Moab is here introduced, or the people are spoken of collectively, in the person of their progenitor, who is represented as mourning over his ruined posterity. Bajith may mean an Idol-temple at Dibon, to which the people resorted with their lamentations and devotions, in their terror and distress. Indeed we know little of the places here mentioned, except the names. (Marg. Ref.) The speedy performance of the prediction would confirm the credit of Isaiah as a prophet, and tend to excite the attention of his contemporaries to his prophecies concerning them.

V. 4. Armed, &c. 'Even the soldiers shall lose their 'courage, and cry as women!' (Lowth.) 'Even the men 'of war, which should by their courage cheer up others, 'shall in despair of success cry and lament; and their life 'shall be but a grief and burden to them; for they are in a 'sad expectation of death.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 5. 'If we understand the prophet, as speaking in 'his own person, it implies that the calamities of Moab 'are so great, as to extort pity even from an enemy.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) Heifer. That is, the Moabites would imitate in their howlings the deep lowing of a full grown heifer, which is observed to be more noisy than the bullock.

V. 7. Brook, &c. Or, the valley of the Arabians. Either the Moabites would intrust their property with the Arabians, or it would be plundered and carried away by them. Some, however, think that Babylon is meant, by the valley of willows.

V. 8. Dimon is derived from the Hebrew word which signifies blood. 'I will bring more and more ca-'lamities; and they that flee to escape the present evils, 'shall fall into worse disasters: as if a man that fled from 'his enemy should meet with a lion to devour him.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) Perhaps lions and other beasts of prey infested the desolate countries, and devoured the remnant of the inhabitants.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst wicked men are asleep or drunken in the night, their enemies are watchful and active; and death often breaks their golden dreams, or silences their tumultuous revels. But let us be sober and vigilant, lest that day should come upon us unawares. The ungodly, when in danger or trouble, may well be alarmed and inconsolable; for they are destitute of a comforter, and of any adequate support. Yet, alas! they are but seldom induced to approach the mercy-seat of God, with penitent sorrow and believing prayer: and all other endeavours to extricate themselves, eventually involve them the more. Temporal sufferings may render life grievous to such as find the thoughts of death intolerable: but some are left to seek escape from present anguish by plunging into eternal misery! How worthless then are men's idolized treasures! And how soon will every possession be torn from them, or made a burden to them! and more anguish still remaineth for impenitent sinners, after all they have suffered, till they fall into that place where is weeping and gnashing of teeth for ever. Yet our hearts should be pained for such men: they are our brethren in Adam, however inimical to us. Whilst therefore we warn them to escape from impending ruin, let us continue to pray for them; that they may seek and find forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance with the redeemed of the Lord in that kingdom which cannot be moved.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVI. V. 1, 2. The Moabites had paid tribute to the kings of David's race, out of their flocks, but when Judah was reduced they revolted; and the prophet seems here to call on them to send again the tributary lamb to Hezekiah, from one end of the land to the other, and to the daughter of Zion, the place of God's worship; as a token of their submission to him, and their desire of deprecating his indignation, by furnishing sacrifices at his Temple. For otherwise the invaders would desolate the land, and drive the daughters of Moab before them, destitute and defenceless, to pass the fords of Arnon, like birds that wander from their nest.

V. 3—5. The Moabites were concerned to take counsel how to escape the judgments that impended over them: and if they would be advised, let them begin by reformation, and doing justice and protecting the oppressed. Many of the Jews had been driven from their habitations, during the distractions of the preceding years: let Moab shelter them as the people of God, and conceal them from their spoilers. For though Israel had been grievously wasted, they would not always continue in that distressed condition. Their ravagers were about to be cut off: God would in mercy establish Hezekiah on the throne, and in the tabernacle of David, as one that would tread in the steps of that prince; maintaining the truth and worship of God, impartially executing justice, seeking diligently to find out the right in every cause, and making haste to reform the nation, and promote righteousness: and then they would again prosper. Bishop Lowth applies the counsel of the prophet to the Jews, and supposes that he exhorted them to entertain the Moabitish outcasts. But though this doubtless was a proper conduct: yet it is more likely that th exhortations were addressed to the same persons against whom the predictions were uttered. Some think that the counsel given to Moab was ironical. In the days of Ahaz, and especially after the victory of Pekah over Judah, the Jews, in great distress, perhaps sought shelter among the Moabites: but the Moabites are supposed to have repelled and betrayed them. Had they at that time acted according to the reasonable advice here given, they might have escaped the ruin that now awaited them: but by their cruelty to the people of God, they provoked his vengeance; Pekah, Remaliah, and other oppressors, had been cut off: Ahaz, the wicked king of Judah, was dead; and Judah no longer needed the assistance of Moab, for Hezekiah's throne was established in mercy, &c. 'He would govern his people 'with an equal mixture of justice and mercy; and therein 'prefigure the Messiah, in whom all the promises made to 'the house of David shall be finally accomplished. "The "tabernacle of David," both here, and in Amos (ix. 11.) 'the only two places in which the phrase is used, mysti- 'cally denotes the church.' (Lowth.)

V. 6. The excessive pride of the Moabites, and their indignation against God's people, were generally reported, and well known: but their deceitful designs would not prosper. Some explain the last clause thus: "His wrath is "greater than his strength." His power is not equal to his vain boastings.

7 Therefore [r] shall Moab howl for Moab, every one shall howl: for the foundations of [s] Kir-hareseth shall ye * mourn; surely they are stricken.

8 For [t] the fields of Heshbon languish, and [u] the vine of Sibmah: [x] the lords of the heathen have broken down the principal plants thereof, they are come even unto [y] Jazer, they wandered through the wilderness; her branches are † stretched out, they are gone over the sea.

9 Therefore [z] I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer, the vine of Sibmah: I will water thee with my tears, [a] O Heshbon, and Elealeh; [b] for ‡ the shouting for thy summer-fruits, and for thy harvest, is fallen.

10 And [c] gladness is taken away, and joy out of the plentiful field; and in the vineyards there shall be no singing, neither shall there be shouting: the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses; I have made their vintage-shouting to cease.

11 Wherefore [d] my bowels shall sound like an harp for Moab, and mine inward parts for [e] Kir-haresh.

12 And it shall come to pass, [f] when it is seen that Moab is weary on the high place, that [g] he shall come to his sanctuary to pray, [h] but he shall not prevail.

13 This is the word that the LORD hath spoken concerning Moab [i] since that time.

14 But now the LORD hath spoken, saying, Within [k] three years, as the years of an hireling, and [l] the glory of Moab shall be contemned, with all that great multitude; [m] and the remnant shall be very small and § feeble.

V. 8—11. The vines of Sibmah seem to have been had in great repute, and to have been thence propagated in very distant regions: but the lords, or conquerors, of the nations would soon destroy them, with all other productions of the land: and then their shouting and singing for the vintage or harvest would utterly cease. The prospect of these calamities greatly affected the Prophet; he could not refrain from weeping, and his inward commotion was such, that he compared it to the tremulous sound of a harp.

V. 12. The king and nobles of Moab, in terror and distress, would weary themselves in sacrificing upon one high place after another, and would then resort to their sanctuary, the chief temple of their god Chemosh, but this would avail nothing to preservation.

V. 13, 14. The Lord had made the approaching ruin of Moab known to his prophets, some time before; but now he fixed the precise date of it; namely, after three exact years, such as hirelings serve. (Notes, Jer. xlviii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most awful denunciations of divine wrath are connected with the discovery of a way of escape, to those who take warning. Submission and tribute are due to such as God hath made rulers of the land; and it is a valuable privilege to obey those who govern according to his word. From one end of the earth to the other, there is no salvation for sinners, but by submitting to the Son of David, and devoting themselves and their substance to him; and they who refuse this, will be reduced to extreme misery, without regard to rank or sex. It behooves all therefore to take counsel: but every device will be in vain; unless they renounce their sins, and learn to "do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God:" these are the genuine fruits of "faith which worketh by love;" and all who love Christ, will be kind to his poor people, and use their influence to provide for and protect them in distress. Extortioners and oppressors may for a time be permitted to afflict them, but they will witness the destruction of every enemy: and such as will not countenance them in their suffering, shall not share their felicity. The Redeemer's throne is established in mercy and in righteousness; his subjects, who share his mercy, rely on his truth, and obey his just commands, are a holy nation; and those rulers who copy his example, may expect to prosper. The pride and enmity of men's hearts commonly render them deaf to the most pressing exhortations. And many, especially the prosperous, the wise, and the learned of the world, are very proud, and apt to be exasperated by the counsel of Christ, and to prefer to it their own lying unprofitable devices. If the Lord have taught us to value what such men despise, let us be thankful: and let us not envy or covet their transient enjoyments; for we may foresee a season when they will terminate in weeping and howling. If that mind be in us which was in Christ, our bowels of compassion will be moved for them: we shall weep in the prospect of those miseries that are coming upon our most indignant enemies; and we shall persist in our endeavours to do them good, "if "peradventure God may give them repentance." But numbers, when driven by distress to their devotions, weary themselves to no purpose; whilst every one goes to his sanctuary to pray; but neglects the mercy-seat, and the great High-Priest of Israel, or only pays an hypocritical regard to them. When the Lord hath spoken, and his appointed time arrives; all the glory, and prosperity, and multitude of the wicked shall be contemned and perish: for "Who can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest "thou?"

NOTES.

CHAP. XVII. V. 1. This prophecy must have been delivered at the time when the kings of Syria and Israel confederated against Judah. It is called "the burden of "Damascus," as foretelling the desolations of that city by the Assyrians; but it was at least equally directed against Israel. Damascus was afterwards rebuilt; and, after many changes, continues to this day. It was for a season "taken away from being a city, and made a ruinous "heap:" but it was not "swept with the besom of de-"struction."

V. 2. Aroer. Aroer was a city on the river Arnon, formerly belonging to Moab: but it might at this time be in the hands of the Syrians. It is, however, much more probable, that there was a district of Syria of the same name, in which several cities were placed. Such coincidences in names are common in all parts of the world.

V. 3. As Syria and Israel had combined in attempting the ruin of Judah and of the house of David, they should be visited with similar judgments. Samaria, the fortress of Israel, would be destroyed, and the kingdom cease from Damascus; nor would the remnant of Syria, which survived the taking of Damascus, any more be established as a kingdom; but, losing all their glory, they would decline like the Israelites, as mingled among other nations, and subject to foreign princes. Accordingly, Syria was first subject to the Assyrians, and successively to the Chaldeans, the Persians, the Macedonians, the Romans and others, even to this day, when it belongs to the Ottoman empire; so exactly has this prophecy been accomplished!

V. 4—8. The glory and prosperity of Israel would more and more decline, like a man in a consumption; and their enemies would waste them, as the husbandman reaps the harvest, and as the gleaner after him collects the scattered ears. Yet a few individuals would be preserved; as a few grapes or olive berries are, when the rest are gathered, being situated out of the gatherer's reach. And these would renounce idolatry, and return to the worship and service of the Lord, looking to him for help, and having respect to his commandments, as the Holy One of Israel: and not to the altars erected to their idols, the work of their own hands. After the ravages of Tiglath-pilezar, several of the Israelites joined themselves to the Jews in celebrating the passover, and in destroying idolatry. (2 Chr. xxx. xxxi.) Afterwards many were incorporated with the Jews; (especially after the Babylonish captivity,) and finally renounced their gross idolatry.

V. 9. This obscure verse probably means, that the cities of Israel would be as entirely desolated, as those of the Canaanites were in the conquest of the land by Joshua. The Septuagint render it, 'Thy cities shall be forsaken; 'as when the Hivites and Amonites forsook,' (that is, their cities,) 'because of the children of Israel; and they shall 'be desert.' Either this is a mere paraphrase and exposition, or the text from which it was translated differed from that of the present Hebrew Bible.

V. 10, 11. 'The pleasant plants and shoots from a 'foreign soil are allegorical expressions for strange and 'idolatrous worship; for vicious and abominable practices 'connected with it; for reliance on human aid, and al'liances entered into with the neighbouring nations.' (Lowth.)—The Israelites bestowed much pains about such plants; but when they expected an harvest from them, it proved a ruinous heap; and instead of rejoicing in possessing the prosperity they were thus seeking, they had intense grief and desperate sorrow as their reward.

V. 12—14. These verses form a detached subject, and describe with great energy the march and ruin of Sennacherib's army. A wo is denounced against his numerous forces collected from many nations. Their noise, and blasphemous rage, and impetuous force, resembled the mighty waters of the sea: but when He, (that is, the God of Israel) should rebuke them, they would flee like the chaff or thistle-down before the whirlwind. (Marg.) In the evening Jerusalem would be in consternation and distress, because of the powerful invader: but before morning almost his whole army would be cut off, and he would flee with the rest, as fast as possible.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

"Though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not be "unpunished:" and if the people of God associate with his avowed enemies, they must expect to share in their heavy judgments. His powerful wrath speedily desolates flourishing cities, and wastes all human glory, as a man's vigour, comeliness, and cheerfulness, decline by an incurable disease: and when sinners are ripe for destruction, the Lord will employ some of his instruments to reap and glean them, till he make a full end of them. But though no impenitent sinner can escape the wrath of God; yet in the worst state of the visible Church, or any part of it, he hath always reserved to himself a few humble believers: these he will place out of the reach of the instruments of his vengeance. Public calamities likewise are often the means of bringing men to renounce their idols and iniquities, to look to the Lord for help, and to have respect to his promises and precepts. But if professed Israelites forget the God of their salvation, and are not mindful of the Rock of their strength; they will seek help, peace, and prosperity in vain, from every quarter; their labour will be lost, and their harvest an heap, in the day of grief and desperate sorrow. But happy are they who remember God as their salvation, and rely on his power and grace: their enemies may rage, and rush upon them with dreadful force and fury; but God shall rebuke them, and they shall flee away as "a rolling thing before the whirlwind." Their trouble and their enemies' prosperity, will be equally transient; their joy will endure for ever, like the destruction of those who hate and spoil them.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 1. This is allowed to be one of the most obscure prophecies in scripture to us; though doubtless well understood by those for whom it was intended. "The land shadowing with wings," marks out Egypt as connected with Ethiopia; and it may be so called on account of the ridges of mountains which shadowed it on each side: or rather, because the Egyptians pretended to shadow the Jews under their protection, as "with wings," against the incursions of the Assyrians. Some, however, on apparently good ground, suppose the original word to denote a musical instrument of a remarkable form, which was peculiar to Egypt, except as others might have derived the use of it from that country.—The land was "beyond," or on each side "the rivers of Cush." The river Nile flowing through Ethiopia and Egypt, is divided into seven streams, or rivers, before it reaches the sea.—The word translated "wo," may be merely a call on them to attend to the message of JEHOVAH.

V. 2. The land intended was remarkable for sending ambassadors, or messengers, upon the seas and rivers, in vessels of bulrushes, or formed of the papyrus; and this was peculiar to the Egyptians, who made vessels of that plant for this purpose. To this country swift messengers were ordered to be sent: that is, the message of the Lord ought assiduously to be conveyed into every part of it; for to them it appertained. The nation is described as "scattered "and peeled;" or, as it may be rendered, "stretched out "and smoothed:" and this may refer to the length of the CHAP. XIX.

Predictions of terrible judgments, which God was about to inflict on Egypt, 1—17. That the Egyptians would worship land of Egypt from north to south, being a vale on each side of the Nile about seven hundred miles long; Ethiopia extends to a considerable length on the south of it; and the whole was smoothed, or made level, by the constant inundations of the Nile. It was also "a nation terrible "from the beginning hitherto," which is characteristical, of Egypt: "a nation meted out, and trodden down;" alluding to the frequent admeasurement of their lands, which was rendered necessary by the inundations of the river, by which their land-marks were destroyed; and to their method of throwing the seed upon their mud, when the waters subsided, and treading it in, by turning their cattle into the fields. "Whose land the rivers have spoiled," or nourished, as some think the original word may mean; and indeed it is so anomalous, that we can only conjecture from what root it is derived.

V. 3. We suppose that this prophecy was published before, but related to, that time, when Sennacherib had routed the army of Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, and was preparing to besiege Jerusalem; intending afterwards to prosecute his advantages against Egypt and Ethiopia. But the Lord seems to have called on them and all the inhabitants of the earth, to attend; and when they saw this proud victor lift up his ensign on the mountains, and blow the trumpet for the assault of Jerusalem, to expect God's extraordinary interposition in behalf of his people.

V. 4—6. God had assured his prophet, that he would rest securely in Zion, contemning the assault of the Assyrians: and he would show his regard to his dwelling place and worshippers, like a clear heat after rain, or like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest; that is, as their protection and consolation in their extreme distress. For whilst the enemy deemed his schemes maturing, as the harvest or vintage; and before the perfect bud and opening flower were ripened into the sour grape, before the critical season of executing his design was arrived: the Lord would cut off all the branches of his vineyard; and his army, and the carcasses of his numerous host would be a plentiful provision for the wild beasts and birds of prey, for a very long time.

V. 7. The nation before described, hearing of this surprising catastophe, would send oblations to be offered at the temple of the Lord of hosts upon mount Zion, giving glory to his name, and presents to Hezekiah. This and similar passages were doubtless intimations, at least, of the conversion of the nations to the God of Israel. (2 Chr. xxxii. 23.) The Egyptians, for the present, would be delivered from the Assyrians, by the power of the God of the Jews; and not the Jews by their assistance: and the doom of that proud tyrant was intended as a warning to them, to renounce their idols and iniquities.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should endeavour to call the attention of mankind to the works of God for his people: for wherever they, live or however they are distinguished, whether they have been prosperous and terrible, or obscure and trampled upon, they are greatly concerned in them: and the warnings of his providence, as well as the oracles of his word, are intended for their conviction. When the arrogant opposers of the truths and the servants of Christ lift up the standard and blow the trumpet of war, and openly assault the church, with full confidence of success; let the inhabitants of the earth attend, and wait for the event. The Lord, undisturbed by their puny efforts, will still delight in Zion, and protect his dwelling place; nor shall the policy or power of hell prevail against his church, as built on this Rock, that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God." He will protect and comfort his people in all their persecutions and tribulations, and render their souls most flourishing in holiness, when their afflictions most abound. But he will blast the ripening schemes of his presumptuous foes, when they deem their success certain; and their future contempt and misery will be proportioned to their present haughtiness and arrogance. Thus shall the nations of the earth be convinced that JEHOVAH is God, and Israel his people, and shall concur in presenting their spiritual sacrifices to his glory. And happy are they, who take warning by his judgments on others, and make haste to join themselves to him and to his people.

NOTES.

CHAP. XIX. V. 1. When the Lord, by "the weapons of his indignation," should come into Egypt with terrible majesty, as riding on a swift cloud, their idols would not be able to afford them any protection; nay, they would become the derision and contempt of the victors; and even the evil spirits which were worshipped through the lifeless images, would be filled with consternation; while the courage of their worshippers would melt, as wax before the fire. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. Not many years after the destruction of Sennacherib's army, the affairs of Egypt were reduced to the utmost confusion and anarchy, by their intestine contentions; these ended, after some years, in the tyranny of twelve princes, who divided the land amongst them; till at length Psammitichus overcame all the rest, and possessed the sole dominion for fifty four years. Some other dreadful civil contests, which took place in Egypt, and tended to its subjection under foreign conquerors, may also be predicted: but in all these difficulties, both the courage and conduct of the people failed; and their magicians could afford them no more help than their idols did.

V. 4. Not long after the death of Psammitichus, Nebuchadnezzar conquered Egypt; and he, and his successors, and afterwards the Persian kings, ruled over that country with despotic sway and most grievous and cruel oppression, till the days of Alexander the Great. The word rendered lord, may more properly be translated lords; and be interpreted of all the usurpers, conquerors, and oppressors, who successively tyrannized over Egypt. But some consider Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, and Belus, as the cruel Lord and fierce king, particularly intended, 'who are both 'branded in history for cruel tyrants and monsters of men.' (Bp. Newton.) The old translation renders it, "a mighty king." Indeed the word admits of that meaning; and then Alexander, the powerful deliverer of Egypt from the oppression of the Persian kings, under whom and his successors, the Egyptians were greatly favoured, may be pointed out, 'I will shut up the Egyptians in the hands of 'severe lords, till a mighty king shall rule over them.'

V. 5—10. The inundations of the Nile failing, the communication of the interior parts of the country with other nations by the sea, might be cut off; the remaining waters would become putrid; the brooks, which were the fences of the fields, or of the cities, would dry up: even the papyrus, and other acquatic plants, which were a considerable article in the commerce of the Egyptians, would wither; the corn sown by the brooks, as well as the productions of the higher grounds, would be destroyed: and their gainful fisheries and manufactures would be ruined for want of materials, or purchasers. (v. 15.) This may be understood literally of a dreadful famine; or figuratively, of the decay of their prosperity, and the drying up of all the sources of their wealth, through their civil distractions. The Septuagint render the last clause, 'All they who make barley-wine shall be grieved in soul.' The Egyptians had few vines; and the use of fermented liquor from barley, or other grain, was very general among them.

and let them know what the LORD of hosts hath purposed upon Egypt.

13 The [z] princes of Zoan are become fools, the princes of [a] Noph are deceived; they have also seduced Egypt, even they that are * the stay of the tribes thereof.

14 The LORD [b] hath mingled a † perverse spirit in the midst thereof: and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, [c] as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit.

15 Neither [d] shall there be any work for Egypt, which the head or tail, branch or rush, may do.

16 In that day shall Egypt be [e] like unto women: and it shall be afraid and fear because of [f] the shaking of the hand of the LORD of hosts, which he shaketh over it.

17 And [g] the land of Judah shall be a terror unto Egypt, every one that maketh mention thereof shall be afraid in himself, [h] because of the counsel of the LORD of hosts, which he hath determined against it.

18 ¶ In [i] that day [k] shall five cities in the land of Egypt [l] speak the ‡ language of Canaan, [m] and swear to the LORD of hosts; one shall be called, The city of § destruction.

§ Or, Heres, or, the sun.

V. 11—14. The Egyptians pretended to an antiquity far beyond any of the neighbouring nations: and their kings (of whom Pharaoh was the common name,) were descended, as they boasted, from a royal race which had continued for some thousand years. This was altogether fabulous: but doubtless Egypt was renowned for wisdom and science, before any other nation, at least in the countries then much known. Yet now their princes and counsellors, who should have been the stay or pillars of the land, and all its tribes, were become foolish and brutish: and whilst they flattered their king, as the son of wise, as well as ancient, kings: they seduced him into foolish measures: or, while they boasted of the wisdom and dignity of their ancestors, they could neither foresee nor prevent the calamities, which God had purposed to bring upon them. If there were any possessed of this wisdom, where were they to be found? Indeed the Lord would give them up to their own perverse schemes, and to quarrel with each other, as their interests, or humours, led them; till the land would be reduced, by their fierce and bloody contests, to the condition of a drunken man, who can scarcely stagger along, and is equally the object of contempt and pity. Zoan was also called Tanais; and Noph, Memphis. The latter is called Moph, (which is not unlike Noph,) in the original of Hos. ix. 6.

V. 15. (Note, 5—10. ix. 14.) Some explain this, not of the people wanting employment, but of all orders neglecting their duty.

V. 16. 'When God intends the destruction of any 'people, he commonly takes from them their strength and 'courage; so that "a thousand shall flee at the rebuke of "one." This is what the heathen expressed by a panic "terror: but Isaiah more properly calls it here, "the shak- "ing of the hand of the LORD of hosts." God's holding 'his rod over a people, and still threatening them with 'severer judgments.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17. 'Considering, through their occasion, the Jews 'made not God their defence, but put their trust in them, 'and were therefore now punished; they, (the Egyptians,) 'shall fear lest the like light on them.' The first invasion of Judah by Sennacherib, when "he took all its fenced "cities," preceded his march into Egypt: and it is probable that the rumour of the ravages and cruelties committed in Judah excited great consternation among the Egyptians. In like manner the destruction of Jerusalem and the captivity of the surviving Jews, seems to have preceded the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, and would be heard of with vast alarm by the distressed inhabitants.

V. 18. The preceding prophecy includes a series of years reaching at least to the time of Alexander the Great, and the favour shown to the Egyptians by him and his successors: and some think, that their subsequent servitude to the Romans, Saracens, and Turks, to this present day, is also predicted. But in the mean time some of them would become acquainted with the true God, learn the language of Canaan, and swear to the Lord of hosts: i. e. they would learn to speak of God and his word and worship, as the Jews did, and to vow obedience to him: or to use his name, and to call him to witness in their solemn oaths, as his worshippers. It is not known what five cities were intended; and there is considerable uncertainty respecting that which "would be called the city of destruction:" though it is commonly supposed to mean Heliopolis, or the city of the sun; and it is thought that it should be thus read. Several cities, however, would be thus favoured, especially one, that had been notorious for idolatry, or was apparently ripe for destruction. Under the Macedonian kings, who succeeded Alexander and reigned in Egypt, peculiar privileges were granted to the Jews, and numbers of them settled in that country: where they professed their religion, and worshipped God in their synagogues. In process of time their scriptures were translated into Greek, which was then generally understood in Egypt; and this translation is now called the Septuagint. Thus the natives gradually became acquainted with God, and his truth and will; and probably many were proselyted to the Jewish religion. A temple also was built by Onias, at Heliopolis, where a worship was performed, similar to that of the temple in Jerusalem: and though this was irregular and not justifiable, yet it might be over-ruled to draw the attention of the Egyptians to the true religion. But though these events were, in some degree, an accomplishment of the prophecy before us: yet it seems more immediately to relate to the planting and flourishing of Christianity in Egypt, in the primitive ages. 'Learned men observe, that the Jews' lan- 'guage is called the language of Canaan; and that the Hebrew 'is the same with the old Phenician language. (Lowth.)

19 In that day shall [n] there be an altar to the LORD, in the midst of the land of Egypt, and a pillar at the border thereof to the LORD.

20 And it shall be [o] for a sign and for a witness unto the LORD of hosts in the land of Egypt: for [p] they shall cry unto the LORD, because of the oppressors, and [q] he shall send them a Saviour, and a great one, and he shall deliver them.

21 And [r] the LORD shall be known to Egypt, and the Egyptians shall know the LORD in that day, [s] and shall do sacrifice and oblation; yea, they [t] shall vow a vow unto the LORD, and perform it.

22 And the LORD shall smite Egypt: [u] he shall smite and heal it: and [x] they shall return even to the LORD, and he shall be intreated of them, and shall heal them.

23 In that day [y] shall there be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria, and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt, and the Egyptian into Assyria, and the Egyptians shall serve with the Assyrians.

24 In that day [z] shall Israel be the third with Egypt and with Assyria, even [a] a blessing in the midst of the land:

25 Whom [b] the LORD of hosts shall bless, saying, [c] Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance.

V. 19—22. 'It is a judicious observation of Calvin, 'that the prophets, when they speak of the Gentiles coming into the church, express their serving the true God 'by such acts of devotion as were most in use in their own time.' (Lowth.) (Note, Ez. xl. 1.) These verses, therefore, seem typically to describe the effects which followed when the Egyptians were converted to Christianity; and not merely the proselyting of some of them previously to the worship of the true God. The altar may denote the atonement of Christ, and access to God through him. (Heb. xiii. 10;) and the pillar, either their avowal of the Lord, as the object of their worship, or his acknowledging of them as his people: and his ordinances among them would be a sign and a witness of their relation to him. Their crying unto the Lord, and his sending them a Saviour and a great one, to deliver them from their oppressors, can be interpreted of their deliverance by Alexander the Great from the Persian yoke, only in a very subordinate sense, if at all: indeed there is not much reason to conclude, that in his days there were many Egyptians, who sought deliverance from God by earnest prayers. Christ himself and his spiritual redemption no doubt were principally intended: unless we suppose some future grand deliverance from the oppressors, to whom the Egyptians are still exposed, to be also predicted. The Lord, however, promised to make himself known unto them, and that they should acknowledge him, and worship him, and pay their vows to him: for his smiting of them would make way for their conversion, their prayers, and their healing, in answer to them.

V. 23—25. For many ages, the Assyrians, (or the Chaldeans, Persians, and Macedonians, who successively had dominion in the same regions,) were engaged in hostilities with the Egyptians; and they fortified their countries against each other: but it is here predicted, that they would unite together and with Israel, in worshipping the Lord; that Israel would prove a blessing between the two nations, by communicating to them the knowledge of God, and his salvation, (Note, Gen. xii. 1—3:) and that the Lord would pronounce them blessed, and show favour to them, as his people and the work of his hands, new created unto holiness; even as he had been used to do Israel his inheritance. 'The work of my hands, is always used by 'this prophet, of those who covenant with God, and are 'members of his church.' (Lowth.) I apprehend that the grand accomplishment of these verses, and perhaps of other parts of this extraordinary prophecy, is still to be expected; for though Christianity flourished much in these regions for some time; yet nothing hitherto seems to have occcurred fully adequate to the expressions here employed.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When ungodly men escape danger, they are apt to think themselves secure; but "evil pursueth sinners," and will speedily overtake them: and when the Lord cometh to execute judgment, every false confidence will fail, and every sinner's heart will melt within him. To punish a guilty nation, the inhabitants need only be left to themselves, and they will soon be set against one another, "every one against his brother, or his neighbour: city "against city, and province against province." Thus the righteous Lord weakens and destroys the counsel of offending nations: and their foolish expedients for deliverance involve them in still deeper guilt and misery. When collective bodies are thus divided among themselves, and either struggling for power, or aiming to preserve or recover their liberties, without regard to God, he often gives them into the hands of some foreign power, which rules over them "as a cruel lord, and as a fierce king:" so that the true friends of civil liberty should begin by seeking the Lord's favour, and liberty from the bondage of sin. He can soon cut off those sources of national wealth and prosperity, which are looked upon as most certain: and whilst kings and nobles are forming and executing their infatuated projects, to aggrandize themselves; the poor are often deprived of employment and subsistence. Indeed the comfort of the lower orders in society is seldom, if ever, duly regarded by ambitious men: yet, where this is neglected, the counsel of the wisest is brutish, and tends to deceive and seduce, whilst it flatters those who depend upon it: and they become the ruin, who should be the stay of the tribes of the land: and all the wisdom, in which men glory, who know not God and regard not his holy will, will at length appear to be the most destructive folly. But he leaves rulers to be actuated by a perverse spirit, and to bring public affairs to the utmost confusion and contempt, in order to punish the lower orders also for their transgressions: and every view of this subject proves, that "righteousness "exalteth a nation, but that sin is the reproach of any "people:" and that invasions, civil wars, and the decay of trade, and the want of employment for the poor, are calls from God to national repentance and reformation. When he shaketh his hand, and showeth tokens of indignation, the most courageous become as women; and he rendereth sinners afraid of those, whom before they despised or oppressed. The counsel of the LORD of hosts, which he hath determined against all the workers of iniquity, will make them a terror to themselves and to each other; and every surrounding object a terror to them. But his severest temporal judgments combine with designs of mercy: and revolutions in mighty kingdoms make way for the success of his Gospel. Already numbers have learned to "speak the "language of Canaan, and to swear to the LORD of hosts;" to erect altars to his name, and to offer him spiritual sacrifices, in those places which were the most addicted to idolatry: and every event of this kind is a proof of the divine original of that blessed book, in which so many prophecies to this effect are contained. The Lord hath indeed sent a Saviour and a great one, to deliver those who were oppressed by Satan; all that cry unto him for that redemption, are made partakers of it; and ere long he will open a way for his Gospel into the remotest nations of the earth. Then hostile nations shall amicably accord in serving him; shall know, trust, and worship him as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and he will acknowledge them as his people, the work of his hands, and his chosen inheritance: and it shall then be known, that Israel, which hath been so despised and hated on earth, was indeed blessed of God, and a blessing in the midst of every land. But let us also observe, what a change the saving grace of God effects upon men's dispositions, conversation, and behaviour. Believing his truth and attending on his ordinances, they learn to speak a new language, sincere, pure, pious, heavenly, and instructive; they become just, harmless, kind and peaceable: and they live in harmony and do good, and aim to be a blessing to their neighbours, and even to their enemies. Finally, let the broken hearted and afflicted, whom the Lord hath wounded and thus taught to return to him and call upon him, take courage; for he will be entreated, and heal their souls, and turn their sorrowing supplications into joyful praises.

NOTES.

CHAP. XX. V. 1. Tartan was one of Sennacherib's captains, who seems to be here called Sargon. Tartan was sent by him to form the siege of Ashdod, a very strong city in Philistia, which afterwards held out against a king of Egypt for twenty-nine years. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 17. xix. 9.) The inhabitants of Ashdod expected help from the Egyptians and Ethiopians; and many of the Jews did the same: but the prophet was ordered to predict Sennacherib's victory over those confederated nations. Some think that Ashdod was at this time in the hands of Hezekiah.

V. 2—4. As multitudes of prisoners, taken by the Assyrians, and reserved for sale as slaves, would be driven before them barefoot and uncovered, save with a short garment, that scarcely sufficed to hide their nakedness: the prophet was ordered to walk abroad in the same manner. As a mourner for the sins and miseries of his people, and as mortified to the world, he was used, it seems, to wear sackcloth constantly; but on this occasion, he was to lay that aside, and to appear exactly as the captives were exposed. This would subject him to ridicule and reproach, and be uneasy both to his body and mind: yet he promptly obeyed. It is not probable that he continued to appear in this manner for three years: but rather it was a sign of what would take place after three years; and the wonder excited by seeing the prophet walking publicly in this manner, would render his prediction the more noticed. If he once walked out thus, it might answer this end: but it is most likely he continued to do so for three days. Sennacherib is computed by some to have been absent above three years, from the time that he first laid Hezekiah under contributions, till he came back to besiege Jerusalem. During this time he gained many advantages over the Egyptians: and just before his return, he obtained a complete victory over Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, when it is probable this prediction was literally fulfilled.

V. 6. This isle. Or country. The Jews would also despair of help from that quarter, and be ready to give up all for lost: but God would deliver them by his own power, and not by heathen allies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should by no means habituate ourselves to indulgence, sloth, or delicacy; for we know not how soon we may be called to endure hardship, reproach, and contempt for the Lord's sake. We ought not indeed to do any thing of our own minds, which may appear absurd or ridiculous; but the world will often deem us foolish or mad, when we are singular in obedience to God; and we must at all times refuse conformity to its vain fashions, and be mortified to its pleasures. The attire and demeanour of ministers should be such, as may best give emphasis to their message, and call men's attention to them as the servants of God; and in order to be a sign and an example to others, we must be such men as the world wonders at. True faith will produce implicit obedience: and the minister cannot reasonably expect that his hearers should regard his doctrine, unless he demonstrate his own belief of it by his practice. The Lord will effectually support his servants under the most painful and mortifying effects of their obedience: and what we are called to suffer for his sake, is commonly very trivial or transient, compared with what numbers groan under from year to year, through the cruelty of conquerors, or lordly oppressors, who hold them in bondage. All men's expectations from, and glorying in created helpers, will end in terror and shame: they who flee for succour to such deceitful refuges, will often be reduced to despair: and if God's people have recourse to these carnal confidences, they will infallibly tend to discourage their hope and comfort; but they, who trust in the Lord, shall never be confounded.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1. Babylon and the adjacent country, is here called "the desert of the sea;" because it was shortly to become a desert, and a marsh full of pools of water; as if converted into a lake, or inland sea; (xiv. 23;) or because it stood in a large plain which was often overflowed by the Euphrates and the Tigris. The whirlwinds in the South of Arabia often come with destructive fury: thus ruin would irresistibly come upon Babylon from Media and Persia, whose armies were very terrible; and through the deserts, which intervened between those countries and Babylon. 'The prophet renews his threat-'enings against Babylon, as afterwards, (xlvii.) to convince 'the Jews, by the repetition, of the certainty of the event: 'and thereby to support them under their captivity when 'it should come.' (Lowth.)

V. 2. The grievous calamities, coming on Babylon, were revealed in vision to the prophet. "There is made "known to me an oppressor of the oppressor, and spoiler "of the spoiler."—'It is now come to the king of Baby-'lon's turn to feel that oppression and ravage himself, 'which he had before brought on others.' (Lowth.) For the Lord had called Elam or Persia, and Media, to go up and besiege Babylon, and so to terminate the sighing of the captive Jews and others who had been oppressed by Babylon.

V. 3—5. About a hundred years before the time, the prophet here seems to personate Belshazzar, on the night when Babylon was taken, and he was slain: (Notes, Dan. v.) We are introduced, as it were, into the banqueting room of that prince, and witness his astonishment: he declares to us his dismay, when he saw the hand that wrote, and the writing, on the wall; and how he was bowed down when Daniel read and explained it to him; how his heart panted, and fearfulness affrighted him; and the night, which he had set apart for pleasure, was thus turned into fear unto him. For whilst he had given orders to prepare the feast and to set the watch; and whilst he and his princes ate and drank; Cyrus had commanded his captains, to burnish their arms, and prepare for the assault: or Belshazzar's princes were called to arms from their riotous feasting.

V. 6—9. The prophet here speaks in his own person. The Lord commanded him to set a watchman, who was to make observations, and give notice of them: and he informed the prophet, that "he saw a chariot, with a couple "of horsemen:" this may mean the chariots of war and the united cavalry of the Medes and Persians; and the chariot of asses and that of camels, may mean the carriages loaded with their baggage, drawn by these animals. It, however, meant the march of Cyrus's army, furnished with every thing requisite for forming the siege of Babylon. Having hearkened diligently with much heed, he further cried, "a lion:" that is, the destroyers of Babylon march forward with great boldness and fury: or, according to the margin, "he cried as a lion," that is, very vehemently.—'The particle as is frequently understood.' (Lowth.) Though the watchman had been used to watch day and night, without being drowsy or deceived, he had never before observed such things: for the chariots and horsemen arrived at once, and instantaneously it was proclaimed that Babylon, with all her graven images, was destroyed, and thrown to the ground. (Notes, Rev. xviii.) All this seems to have passed before the prophet's mind in vision; and was descriptive of his own office and duty, as a prophet and watchman to the house of Israel. Nor does this rapid succession of events accord to the warning of the king of Babylon's watchmen, nor indeed to any thing which could really exist: for it comprises the transactions of many years; nay, it is probable that the ruin of the New Testament Babylon also was intended to be predicted.

V. 10. 'O my people, who, for your punishment I 'shall make subject to the Babylonians, to try and to 'prove you, and to separate the chaff,' (or the straw,) 'from the corn, the bad from the good among you; hear 'this for your consolation: your slavery and oppression 'will have an end in the destruction of your oppressors. (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 11, 12. This is a distinct, brief, obscure, and almost enigmatical prophecy. Dumah is Idumea, or the land of the Edomites. Some one of that nation, in vision, called to the prophet, as the watchman who waked when others slept, to inquire, what time of the night it was? or what were the news of the night? This may either mean an earnest inquiry of the Edomites concerning the fate of their own country: or perhaps an insulting inquiry, concerning the duration of the afflictions of the Jews, in the Babylonish captivity. (Ps. cxxxvii. 7.) To this the watchman answered, "The morning cometh, and also the "night:" this may mean, that the deliverance of the Jews would come in its appointed time; yet the day of prosperity would be succeeded by a dark night of adversity: or that, after a short continuance of approaching prosperity to the Edomites, a dreadful ruin would come on them, of which the prophet saw no end. But 'if ye will in-'quire indeed, and ask questions in earnest; inquire of 'God first, ask his mercy, and afterward come again, and 'ye shall have a more favourable answer.' (Lowth.)

V. 13—17. This is a short prophecy concerning calamities, which were coming upon the Arabians. The travelling companies of the Dedanim, a tribe of the Arabians, would shelter themselves in the forests from their hostile invaders: and let other tribes, who were not molested, meet them with provisions, that they might not perish; (it may be translated as a command,) for indeed they fled from the most imminent danger of death. These desolations were to take place in an exact year from the publishing of this prophecy; and probably it was accomplished by Sennacherib when he first marched his army into Judah. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The history of mankind is little more than a detail of the treachery, rapine, and cruelty, which they have committed, and of the miseries which they have endured: and an insight into futurity would be attended with many grievous discoveries, respecting ourselves, our families, and those with whom we should sympathize. But "sufficient "for the day is the evil thereof."—What anguish and horror must seize the enemies of God, when he shall arise to execute vengeance upon them; and when all they see, hear, remember, or expect, shall tend to increase their terror! This some perceive to be their wretched case, at the approach of death: and all the ungodly will know it in another world. But words can never express, nor can imagination reach to an adequate conception of their dismay and despair. And what numbers will there dolefully exclaim, "the night of my pleasure hath he turned into "fear unto me!" Whilst sinners are saying, let us eat, drink, and be merry; and let others watch for our souls if they will: perhaps the Lord is about to say, "Thou "fool, this night is thy soul required of thee." He hath set ministers, as watchmen, to declare what they see: let every one, therefore, to whom this office is committed, hearken diligently, with much heed to his instructions, and continue day and night upon his watch-tower; and give sinners warning of their approaching danger; that at least he may deliver his own soul. (Ezek. xxxii. 1—9.) And let him declare the whole counsel of God, as far as he can learn it, whether it relate to mercies or judgments. And let all who love their souls attend to the warnings of such ministers, as may truly say, "that which "I have heard of the LORD, have I declared unto you." For all the enemies of God will as surely be destroyed, as Babylon and her graven images are fallen: but every trial shall tend to purify true believers, that they may be gathered as wheat into the garner. There are many who make curious inquiries of the watchmen; they would willingly have many nice questions resolved, and abstruse prophecies interpreted; and they want to know exactly where we now are in the series of predicted events: but they do not inquire into the state of their own souls: or about the way of salvation, the path of duty, or how to grow in grace. These are mere Edomitish inquirers: and though we should be ready, as far as we can, to answer any proper question; yet we ought to warn such men to look to themselves, and to repent, and return to God by faith and prayer, before they amuse themselves with such discussions. Whilst they forget their time of life, and are growing old in their sins; it little concerns them to inquire what time of the night it is with the church: for though the morning of her deliverance cometh, yet the midnight of their final misery approacheth with equal speed. Calamities must go round, in this sinful world: and it behooves us to relieve the distresses of our brethren, knowing that our turn may come shortly. But happy are they only, whose riches and glory are placed out of the reach of hostile invaders; all other prosperity will speedily pass away, for the Lord God of Israel hath spoken it.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1. Jerusalem, as seated in the midst of surrounding hills, and favoured with the revelation of God's truth and will, is here called "The valley o "vision." The prophet saw, in vision, all the inhabitants of that city gone up to the flat roofs of their houses, on a sudden alarm, and to make observations: and he inquired what was the matter. Their houses in general were without windows towards the street.

V. 2, 3. Jerusalem had been full of the hurry and tumult of business and pleasure: but now their stir and tumult was of another nature. Being invested by their invaders, numbers died, not by the sword of war, but by famine and pestilence, or terror: their rulers agreed to flee together; but they were overtaken and bound as prisoners by the archers: and even they that had fled from afar, to take shelter within the walls of the city, were bound together with the rest of the inhabitants. (Note, 2 Kings xxv. 4—7.)

V. 4. 'He showeth what is the duty of the godly, 'and especially of the ministers, when God's plagues hang 'over the church.'

V. 6, 7. Elam and Kir, or the Persians and Medes, might serve in Sennacherib's army as subjects to Assyria. Yet this part of the prophecy seems to accord best to the demolition of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. For it does not appear, that any destructive pestilence or famine raged in the city, when Sennacherib invaded the land; or that the rulers fled, or were taken and bound; or that the walls were broken down. By "chariots of men," we may understand those in which men rode and fought; for the word translated chariots, is used for carriages employed in other uses.

V. 8—14. The preceding verses, though they chiefly relate to subsequent events, might have also some reference to previous calamities: but these evidently predict Sennacherib's invasion, and the behaviour of the Jews on that occasion. He dismantled many of their fortified cities, which had been the covering or protection of Judah; and he threatened the siege of Jerusalem. This put Hezekiah and his princes upon examining the state of their armouries and fortifications; and upon making various preparations for defending the city. (Notes, 2 Chr. xxxii. 4.) But numbers of the people had no proper regard to the Lord, who had constituted Jerusalem to be the place of his own worship, and had long before fashioned every thing respecting it in subserviency to that end. Notwithstanding the pious labours of Hezekiah and others, most of the people were destitute of faith and piety: and instead of uniting in fasting and prayer, with every token of godly sorrow and humiliation, to which the Lord evidently called them, they were generally indulging themselves in riot and feasting, and that from the most atheistical principles; as if the apparently near approach of death urged them to seize the present fleeting moment for sensual gratification. (Marg. Ref.) The Lord was so provoked by this profane contempt of his uplifted scourge, that he determined to accept of no expiatory sacrifices for it; but to punish it by the death of the criminals: though for his own name's sake he would, for that time, spare the city. 'There 'were two pools, in or near Jerusalem, supplied by 'springs: the upper pool, or the old pool, supplied by the 'spring Gihon, towards the higher part of the city, 'near Zion:—and the lower pool, probably supplied by 'Siloam.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'The ditch was a channel 'to carry the waters from the upper to the lower pool.' (Lowth.)

V. 15. This prophecy concerning Shebna seems to have been delivered about the same time with the preceding: and perhaps he was one of the ringleaders in the unseasonable and profane riot. Some think that he had been preferred by Ahaz to be treasurer and steward of the household; and that he outwardly complied with Hezekiah's reformation, to keep his place, though a proud and wicked man. (Marg. Ref.) If this were the Shebna, of whom we read in the history of Sennacherib's invasion, the prophecy had not its full accomplishment till some years after. Some think he was deprived of his office as treasurer, but still continued scribe or secretary. (xxxvi. 3.) But more probably another person of the same name is there meant.

V. 16. It is thought that Shebna was a foreigner; that, instead of being prime minister to Hezekiah, he had no right to associate with the Jews at all, and that his connexions and inclinations led him to favour their enemies. He, however, deemed himself established in authority till death; and had prepared himself a magnificent sepulchre in a lofty situation, according to the custom of monarchs; and durable, as if graven out of a rock, to perpetuate his memory and grandeur after his decease. The latter part of the verse may be more properly rendered, "O thou "that hewest out thy sepulchre on high, &c."

19 And [n] I will drive thee from thy station, and from thy state shall he pull thee down.

20 And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will call my servant [o] Eliakim the son of Hilkiah:

21 And I will [p] clothe him with thy robe, and strengthen him with thy girdle, and I will commit thy government into his hand: and he shall be [q] a father to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and to the house of Judah.

22 And [r] the key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; [s] so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open.

23 And [t] I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place; and he shall be for [u] a glorious throne to his father's house.

24 And they shall [x] hang upon him all the glory of his father's house, the offspring and the issue, all [y] vessels of small quantity, from the vessels of cups, even to all the ‡ vessels of flagons.

V. 17—19. Notwithstanding Shebna's ostentatious confidence, his ruin was at hand. He would be degraded from his dignity; violently forced into captivity; covered with infamy, as the condemned criminal's face was covered for execution; driven from place to place, in a strange country like a ball, when driven with great force in an open field, where no wall or fence obstructs its course: and at length he would die in misery and disgrace: whilst the remains of his magnificence would shame that family, which had preferred so ostentatious and vile a man. Doubtless this sentence was speedily and exactly executed, though we know not in what manner.

V. 20—25. God appointed Eliakim, his servant, to succeed Shebna: he knew that Hezekiah would be obedient to his word; and this probably occasioned Shebna's disgrace. Eliakim was to have the robe and girdle, which were worn by those in office; and he would fill his high station with the prudence and affection of a father to the Jews. The key also was a token of authority in those days, as the seals are now: being an emblem, that much was intrusted to a man's care, and at his disposal; and that he could admit to, or exclude from, manifold privileges or advantages. Probably either a real key, or the figure of one, was worn upon the shoulder: and as Christ applies this to himself, we may look upon Eliakim as a type of him. (Marg. Ref.) As nails are also fixed in the walls, on which to hang such things as might be wanted: thus Eliakim would be established in authority, and act so honourably, that his advancement would be like raising his "father's house to a glorious throne:" and all the reputation and interest of every branch of the family would be secure in his hands: for he would be able and willing to take care of them, whether more or less considerable: whilst such as had depended on wicked Shebna, would be ruined by his fall. (Marg. Ref.) 'Keys in old times were 'long, and made like a hook, and then laid on the shoulder, 'and worn as the badge of an office.' (Lowth.) 'They, '(the Asiatics,) fix the nails in the brick-work, when 'they are building. They are large nails, with square 'heads like dice, well made; their ends being bent so as 'to make them cramp irons.' (Chardin.) 'These nails 'were of necessary and common use, and of no small 'importance, in all their apartments. (Bp. Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

No burden will be more heavy than that which falls on the valley of vision, and weighs down those who abuse the means of grace. They that have been most secure and prosperous, and those cities that have been most full of the tumultuous hurry of business, pleasure, and ambitious contests, are liable above all others to be surprised with unexpected calamities, and to be left without redress under them. The Lord hath so many ways of destroying his enemies, that it is as vain to attempt fleeing from, as withstanding, the power of his wrath. The servants of God, who clearly foresee, and awfully warn sinners of, their approaching miseries, are most affected by the prospect. They sometimes weep bitterly, and refuse to be comforted, because of the trouble, perplexity, and ruin, which are coming on their beloved relatives and countrymen: yet, whilst their hearts thus melt with tender compassion, they are counted cruel and morose; because they insist upon it, that God will execute this threatened vengeance on all the ungodly. But all the horrors of a city taken by storm, and given up to indiscriminate rapes, murders, and plunder, are scarcely a shadow of the terrors of "the day of wrath, "and revelation of the righteous judgment of God." Yet the invasion of a fertile country, when the choicest valleys are full of hostile armies, and the gates of cities beset with merciless besiegers, must be inexpressibly distressing to the inhabitants. Often the approach of danger discovers that weakness which before was unnoticed: yea, and detects that hypocrisy which had not been suspected; and then the further men examine, the more they discover their exposed and perilous situation. But too generally they look only to externals, and rest in a superficial amendment; without duly respecting the Creator of the world and the Head of the church, who fashioned both long ago, for his own glory, and the good of his people: nor can the most pious rulers or teachers cure men of infidelity, impiety, or hypocrisy; except as the Lord worketh by them.—It is no new thing even in Israel for men not to know the signs of the times; and when the Lord calls to repentance, fasting, and prayer; nay, when kings, as well as ministers, obey the call and warn others to do so: numbers continue to indulge their lusts, and add to their sins, and increase the fierce wrath of God against them; as if "let us eat, and drink, "for to-morrow we die," were indeed a sentiment worthy of a rational creature! And whether this infidelity work by presumption, or desperation, it produces the same contempt and defiance of God; and is a lamentable token, that a man is given up to judicial hardness of heart, and will perish in his impenitency.

V. 15—25.

The impiety of the lower orders in society is often an aping of their superiors. Too often they, who ought not to find admission into the visible church, (having nothing there,) are at the head of her affairs: and though no human wisdom and piety can always prevent this: yet generally the ostentation, ambition, and avarice of such men, are a scandal to those who employ them, and even to their families. But what a vanity is all earthly grandeur, which death will so soon terminate! And what will it avail, whether we be laid in a magnificent monument, or covered with a sod? Surely the fopperies of death are the vainest of all vanities! Yet they who most value them, are often deprived of them: and no stability can ensure the continuance of prosperity. When the Lord is displeased, he soon drives men with violence from their places, and hurries them from one vexation to another, till they die in disgrace and misery. But it is happy for nations, when the removal of wicked men makes way for the true servants of God into authority. They will act as his stewards, and as the deputies of the Son of David; and in the insignia of their dignities, they will read their duties, and thence learn righteousness, faithfulness, and goodness, and will study to be fathers to the people, especially to the remnant of true Christians. When extensive authority is lodged in such hands, it will be used for the benefit of mankind: and such rulers are indeed a credit to their families, and will promote their interests in subserviency to the public good: but all dependence placed on the ungodly, will soon be thrown down with them into perdition. Indeed no expectations can properly be formed of advantage even from pious men, except as the instruments of God for our good. But the Father hath lodged all authority in heaven and earth in the hands of his beloved Son, who for our sakes became also his righteous servant. To him he hath intrusted the infinite concerns of his own glory and the honour of his law, to all eternity: and if we submit to his authority, we may confidently hang all our hopes and interests, and those of our families, upon him: and in every thing rely on his wisdom, power, truth, and love. Such are great concerns to us; though compared with the other, they are trivial: but great or small, they are perfectly safe in his hands. He hath opened our way of access into the presence of our reconciled Father; he will set before us an open door, which no man can shut, both whilst we live and when we die, and bring both soul and body to his eternal glory. But they, who neglect so great salvation, will find, that when he shutteth, none can open: and his hands will shut them out of heaven, and shut them up in hell for ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1. It is generally agreed, that this prophecy foretels the destruction of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar. (Marg. Ref.) The ships and mariners, by whom the commerce between Africa and Europe in general, or Carthage and Spain in particular, with Tyre, was carried on, are called on to mourn and howl at her ruin.—'Tyre was one of the most famous marts in the world in 'those times; and the destruction of it must be a great 'loss to all merchants, and adventurers.—Every house 'or warehouse in Tyre is shut up.' (Lowth.)—'The Tyri-'ans, when they saw no other means of escaping, fled in 'their ships, and took refuge in Carthage, and in the 'islands of the Egean and Ionian sea: from whence the 'news would soon spread, and reach Tarshish, or Tar-'tessus.' (Bp. Lowth.) Thus the ruin of Tyre was revealed to them, (the inhabitants of Tarshish,) from the isles of Chittim, or the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.

V. 2. Silence is a mark of grief and consternation, and that entire failure of commerce, which a close siege would effect, silenced the noise of the busy multitudes, which before was heard in this merchant-city. There were two distinct cities, called old and new Tyre, the former a sea port on the continent, the latter on an island at a small distance, and dependent upon the other. The Zidonians built Tyre, which is therefore called the daughter of Zidon; (Marg. Ref.) and it was replenished with all its riches by the trade which it originally derived from the mother city: but it soon acquired a vast pre-eminence above it. Nebuchadnezzar took old Tyre after a siege of thirteen years: but the inhabitants had previously removed their most valuable effects either to new Tyre on the Island, or to places beyond sea. After a time new Tyre became a very flourishing city; but it was besieged and taken by Alexander the Great.

V. 3. Sihor means the river Nile. (Marg. Ref.) The Tyrians traded largely with the Egyptians for the corn, which their lands, watered by the Nile, yielded them in vast abundance: and thus, the harvest of the river, springing from the seed sown when its great waters subsided, yielded an immense revenue to Tyre. That river also opened a communication to the Tyrians into the interior parts of Egypt; and the rich commodities there purchased tended greatly to enrich that merchant-city.

V. 4. 'The Zidonians, when their city was taken by 'the king of Ascalon, betook themselves to their ships, 'and landed and built Tyre.' (Justin.) Zidon therefore gloried in being the founder of Tyre, that strength of the sea, and, as it were, the sole proprietor of it: but she might now be ashamed; for her daughter complained that she was depopulated, and instead of sending colonies to other cities, she had now no children brought forth, or growing up to replenish herself. New Tyre, indeed, continued for many ages a flourishing city: but from the time that Alexandria in Egypt was built, her trade began to decrease, and at length Tyre was utterly desolated: and there are at this day no remains of that renowned city, except a few huts for fishermen. Let us not forget that these are standing miracles to demonstrate the divine original of the sacred Scriptures.

V. 5. As the nations were alarmed at the desolations of Egypt, by the power of God, in the days of Moses: so the report of the ruin of Tyre would fill them with equal consternation. Or, 'When the tidings shall reach Egypt, 'they shall be seized with anguish at the report of Tyre, 'because the Egyptians exported their corn to Tyre, and 'made a gainful trade of it.—This sense the Septuagint 'follows.' (Lowth.)

V. 6, 7. The Tyrians gloried in the great antiquity of their city: and indeed it seems to have been a flourishing city in the time of Joshua. (Josh. xix. 29.) Through its extraordinary wealth, it was replete with every thing conducive to festive indulgence; and the inhabitants were very jovial and luxurious. But now they would leave home with howlings and anguish of spirit; and numbers of them would be forced to seek a habitation in distant countries, either as captives or refugees. The Septuagint, instead of Tarshish, reads Carthage, which was a colony from Tyre. —'The prophet speaks of Tyre, as a delicate woman not 'used to hardships, who yet should be forced to travel on 'foot tedious journeys into foreign countries.' (Lowth.)

V. 8, 9. The Tyrians seem to have boasted of being able to dispose of crowns and kingdoms as they pleased; and therefore the Lord had counselled to tarnish the pride of all human glory, by ruining that renowned and haughty city, whose merchants were princes, whose traffickers were the honourable of the earth. (Note, ii. 11.)

V. 10. The inhabitants of Tyre, when the city should be close pressed by the Chaldeans, would steal away, silently and speedily, to leave the country, which had no longer any strength or defence; as a river, swiftly, yet almost imperceptibly, glides through the land.—Tyre may be called the daughter of Tarshish; because her grandeur was greatly the effect of her trade with that city; and because of the close connexion which subsisted betwixt the two cities, and the dependence of the Tyrians on Tarshish, after Tyre was taken. "Pass through thy land to the daughter of "Tarshish." (Old Trans.) Some think the expression relates to the ships of Tarshish, with which Tyre carried on her commerce and acquired her greatness. (14. Notes, 1 Kings x. 22.)

V. 11. Either Nebuchadnezzar, or Alexander the Great, may here be intended; or God himself, as employing them. Each of them was a mighty conqueror, who, as it were, stretched his hand over the sea, and shook the kingdoms: and each of them besieged and took Tyre. But they had their commission from God, to destroy the strong holds of that merchant-city: Or, "of Canaan:" (Marg. Ref.) Tyre was the principal strong-hold in the land of Canaan; the word, however, signifies a merchant.

V. 12. Zidon seems to have been one of the oldest cities in the world; (Marg. Ref.) it is mentioned by Homer, but Tyre is not: Tyre was called "the daughter "of Zidon;" as built by the Zidonians. 'The prophet 'calls Tyre an oppressed virgin, because she was con-'quered, and as it were ravished, by her enemies. Where-'as those cities, which never came into a conqueror's 'hands, are called virgins.' (Lowth.) The Assyrians besieged Tyre, but could not take it: and Nebuchadnezzar was its first conqueror, and the inhabitants, no longer able to resist, passed over in great numbers into the countries bordering on the Mediterranean: but the colonies of Tyrians in Greece, Sicily, Spain, or Africa, had no rest. Carthage was a colony from Tyre, and her unsuccessful and ruinous contest with the Romans is well known; and the others were greatly disquieted and at length reduced by the same power.

V. 13. 'The Chaldeans, Chasdim, are supposed to 'have taken their name from Chesed, the son of Nachor—'the brother of Abraham. (Gen. xxii. 22.) Moses calls 'Ur in Mesopotamia,—Ur of the Chaldees.—Jeremiah 'calls them an ancient people.'—"Yet this people was "not,"—they were of no account,—'they were not reck-'oned among the great and potent nations of the world; 'a barbarous people, without laws or settled habitations; 'and addicted to rapine. (Job i. 17:) till Assur, some 'powerful king of Assyria, gathered them together, and 'settled them in Babylon and the neighbouring country.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'The Assyrians were at that time, (when 'this prophecy was delivered,) the great monarchs of the 'east; the Chaldeans were their slaves and subjects: and 'therefore it is the more extraordinary that the prophet 'should foresee the conquests of the Chaldeans.' (Bp. Newton.) This obscure people were appointed by the Lord to destroy renowned and haughty Tyre.

V. 14. (Note 1. Ez. xxvi. 15—18.)

V. 15—18. From the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, who in some respects was the founder of the Babylonian monarchy, to the ruin of it by Cyrus, were exactly seventy years. And for a term equal to the days of this one king or kingdom, Tyre continued in obscurity and neglect. Learned men have shown, that it was just seventy years from the taking of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, to the time when Darius Hystaspis, by granting some immunities to that city, made way for the recovery of its trade and prosperity. But as covetousness is idolatry, and idolatry is spiritual whoredom; the arts of this commercial city to re-establish her trade were represented by those which harlots then used to draw the attention of their lovers. For seventy years Tyre had been as a neglected harlot: but she again employed her former arts to regain her traffic; and was rendered prosperous by divine providence. But in consequence she corrupted all kingdoms with her pride, avarice, and luxury. In due time the Lord intended to plant the Gospel there: then numbers of the Tyrians, being converted to Christ, would use that wealth, which had been acquired by commerce, and about which men generally commit much wickedness, to maintain the ministry of the gospel, to feed the poor, and to spread the Christian religion: being able, through their affluence, to provide sufficiently for these expenses, which poorer churches could scarcely defray. And then the wealth of Tyre, which had been as the hire of an harlot, would become holiness to the Lord. (Marg. Ref.)—We read of those about Tyre and Zidon attending upon Christ's ministry. A church was early formed in Tyre, which became a kind of mother-church to several others that were connected with it: so that Christianity was established at Tyre, till the Saracens took the city; and from that time it gradually decayed, till it was at length almost entirely desolated. (Notes, Ez. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Every advantage may become an occasion of mischief to us, through the depravity of our hearts: and therefore commerce, which might be, and sometimes has been, subservient to the noblest purposes, too commonly proves a source of luxury, pride, ostentation, and impiety; and is connected with avarice, fraud, oppression, and cruelty.—As those cities, which have successively tyrannized over the nations of the earth, have successively been made monuments of the divine vengeance: so have those likewise, that have been the marts of nations. still for a short space, and to contemplate the fate of Tyre. Like that ancient centre of commerce, this city and nation are replenished by the trade of the whole earth; claim the sovereignty of the ocean, and receive revenues from distant seas and rivers, not less abundant than the harvest of our fertile plains: and London is as least as joyous a city, as ever Tyre was, though it does not boast of so great an antiquity. But Tyre is now laid waste, and there is no house nor entering in: silence and solitude have erected their empire where this busy merchant-city stood; and her inhabitants are all either extinct or removed to other lands! Yet when this prediction was delivered, probably its wealthy inhabitants could not have believed it possible that such a change should ensue. This report may well cause our wealthy but ungodly citizens, (of whom there are not a few,) to be sorely pained and alarmed: her merchants were, and ours are, princes, and the honourable of the earth. But they gloried and trusted in, and abused, their prosperity: and the Lord took his counsel against them on purpose "to stain the pride of all glory, and to "bring into contempt all the honourable of the earth:" that they who had forgotten him should feel his superiority and sovereignty; that the vanity of all earthly prosperity might be manifested; and to show how soon infamy must overwhelm all those that do not seek the honour which cometh from God. He is able to raise up enemies against us also from the most obscure nations, and to bring them from the remotest corners of the earth: and at his commandment some savage conqueror may arise to execute his righteous purposes; nor can any distant country give rest to those of whom God hath said, there is no rest for them. The accomplishment of the prophecies, in every successive age to the present day, evinces, that every promise and threatening in the sacred volume, will surely take place on those nations or individuals to which they belong. It cannot be calculated how much iniquity is committed by such as are greedy of gain: Nor can the manifold artifices be developed, by which crafty traffickers supplant, over-reach, and cheat each other, and seduce the ignorant and unwary. Numbers care not what crimes they commit, or tempt others to, or what miseries they occasion, provided they do but get their hire, which is often more infamous than that of the vilest prostitute. But whilst these are treasuring up wrath, with their accumulating wealth, and corrupting whole kingdoms by such traffick, as tends to disseminate intemperance or murder; there are some even in our land who conduct their commercial concerns with other views and on other principles. By honourable gains they possess affluence; and they neither treasure it up in avarice, nor spend it in profligacy: but consecrate it to the Lord, and employ it to diffuse the knowledge of his truth to distant regions; to provide sufficient and suitable food and raiment for his indigent servants; and to relieve the wants of multitudes, of whom they know no more, than that they are human beings in distress. Now this is noble; and riches thus obtained and expended, are a privilege and a blessing. Thus should Christians conduct business, as the servants of God; and use riches as his stewards. As vital godliness abounds, such characters will become more numerous, and then commerce will be rendered a blessing, not only to the cities where it is conducted, but to the human species at large.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1—12. Various opinions have prevailed concerning the events predicted in this chapter, which begins a new subject that is continued to the end of the twenty-seventh chapter. Some think that it is a general denunciation of vengeance from God on sinful nations and on the whole earth: and, like many other prophecies, it is couched in such terms as may apply to many similar events, and can scarcely have its full accomplishment, except in the consummation of all things. But it seems more immediately to contain a series of prophecy relating to the nation of Israel and to the church, which is yet fulfilling, but not accomplished. The desolation of the kingdom of Israel by the Assyrians, and that of Judah by the Chaldeans; and the ravages afterwards committed by Antiochus Epiphanes, may be adverted to: but the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the dispersion of the Jews into all nations, with those events connected with, and resulting from, that awful dispensation, seem principally intended; till the close of the chapter, when a transition appears to be made to other important matters.—The same original word is rendered the earth and the land: and generally means the land of Israel. When the Chaldeans and afterwards the Romans took Jerusalem, then "the "LORD emptied and wasted that land, and turned it upside "down, that none of its inhabitants might continue in "it;" and, in the latter dispensation, instead of sending them to some specified place, for a limited term of years, as before, he scattered them abroad over the face of the earth, and their dispersion continueth to the present day. The distinction between priests and people was soon lost with their genealogies; and all ranks and orders of men were involved in indiscriminate ruin. Thus the land being emptied and plundered, as it were, mourneth and fadeth away, and is become at this day as barren as it formerly was fruitful.—By the world, may be meant, the whole of the Jewish economy; the Mosaic dispensation and the civil establishment of Israel as a nation, which waxed old, languished, and expired, together with the destruction of all the haughty despisers of their lowly Messiah. For the land had long been polluted by the crimes, especially the profaneness and hypocrisy of the people, who not only transgressed God's laws, but made them of none effect by their traditions; they not only changed his ordinances, but they expressly broke the national covenant, which had endured for ages, by rejecting the promised Messiah, through whom it had been ratified: and thus they were deprived of all their covenanted privileges. Then the curse of God devoured and desolated the land: his wrath, like fire, burned up the inhabitants, till very few in comparison were left of that devoted nation. Then their abused plenty and sensual mirth ceased; nay, the temple-music, and sacred psalmody, and solemn feasts, were put an end to; or rather were turned into lamentations, howlings, and bitterness of soul. The city, having become a scene of confusion, by the intestine discords of its inhabitants, and having experienced all the horrors of famine and pestilence in the extreme, was broken down by the Romans, and the Jews were excluded from all access to it. In vain did they then cry out for some cordial to support them under their extreme distress: "all joy was darkened, and the mirth of "the land was gone. The city was left desolate, the gate "was smitten with destruction."

V. 13—15. 'The great distresses, brought upon Israel 'and Judah, drove the people away, and dispersed them 'all over the neighbouring country. They fled to Egypt, 'to Asia Minor, to the islands, and the coasts of Greece.— 'They were greatly instrumental in propagating the know- 'ledge of the true God among these heathen nations, and pre- 'paring them for the reception of christianity.' (Bp. Lowth.)—The word, rendered the sea, is sometimes translated, the west: because the Mediterranean sea was the western border of Canaan. (Hos. xi. 10.)—The chief accomplishment of this prophecy seems to have been after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. At that season there was a small company, like the gleanings of the vine or the olive, which had embraced christianity: and wherever they were dispersed among the nations and in the isles of the sea, they lifted up their voice in songs of praise, whilst they beheld the majesty of God displayed in accomplishing these predictions; and mingled thanksgivings with their fervent prayers; nay, they excited one another to glorify God, in the fiery trial of persecution, and though banished to the remotest regions. (Marg. Ref.) The destruction of Jerusalem was exceedingly conducive to the establishment of the Christian church; and in this respect was the subject of joy and praise to the primitive Christians.

V. 16. This verse seems an intimation of the calling of the Gentiles, as the consequence of the rejection of the Jews. Whilst the former, from the uttermost parts of the earth, were ascribing glory to the righteous Lord: the prophet, personating the Jewish nation, lamented his leanness: that is, the small number of believers found in Israel, the corrupted state of the church, and the miseries that had come upon the nation; whilst the Jews were cruelly abused by their treacherous and violent enemies, according to their own hypocrisy and enormous wickedness.

V. 17—20. In taking wild beasts the hunters used to terrify them, that in their fright they might run into their pits, or be taken in their snares. Thus terror would drive the Jews into those very places in which destruction was prepared for them, and every thing would concur in preventing their escape. For the flood-gates of divine vengeance being opened from above, the foundations of the earth would shake, as if the end of the world were come.—'God's wrath and vengeance should be over and under 'them, so that they should not any more escape than at 'Noah's flood.' (Marg. Ref.) There were many great earthquakes about the time of the siege of Jerusalem: and Christ predicted the destruction of that city in terms very similar, and which may also be interpreted of the consummation of all things. Indeed the transgression of that land, especially in crucifying the Lord of glory, was heavy upon it; and thus it fell, and hath never risen again to this day as it did after the Babylonish captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 21, 22. Here a transition seems to be made from the ruin of the Jewish nation for opposing the Gospel, to that of the anti-christian powers, which will introduce a general prevalence of true religion; and such transitions are common in the prophets. But the subversion of the idolatrous Roman empire, (after it had executed God's judgments on Jerusalem,) to make way for the firmer establishment of Christianity in the primitive ages, may also be intended, as a shadow of the other more decisive events. However, all the hosts of the high ones and the kings of the earth that oppose the Gospel, will be gathered as prisoners into a dungeon, deprived of power to do further mischief; and at last produced to take their trial, and receive their sentence. Some commentators, by "the host of the "high ones," understand the devil and his angels.—'Kings 'used to confine the chief commanders of their enemies, 'whom they took prisoners, and reserve them to some ex-'traordinary day of triumph, and then bring them out to 'public punishment.'—'I cannot find any explication 'so agreeable to the natural sense of the words, as that of 'a late learned writer on the revelation, who explains it of 'the kings of the earth who made war with Christ and his 'saints, at Armageddon: and being there discomfited, lay 'languishing under the sentence of condemnation, till after 'the battle of Gog and Magog, when they were, with 'Satan their leader, punished with everlasting destruction.' (Lowth.) (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xvi. 16. xix. 11—21. xx.)

V. 23. When this victory hath been won, the Millennium will begin: the Lord will set up his kingdom in its fullest glory on earth; and its splendour shall eclipse and put to shame not only the borrowed light of the moon, but that of the sun also; that is, all the majesty of the mightiest kingdoms, as well as that of the subordinate ones. He will then reign as Lord of hosts, upon his mercy-seat, and among his ancient people, or the elders or ministers of his church, in unrivalled and unclouded glory and majesty.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

They, whose treasures and felicity are laid up on earth, will soon be reduced to indigence and misery: for the Lord will make the whole of it waste and empty; nay, he will turn it upside down, and shake all its inhabitants out of it. Even in great national convulsions, the superior orders are often first exposed to peril and ruin: and in the great day of God, the ungodly priest, or prince, or wealthy man, will have more to answer for and will receive deeper condemnation than his inferiors; and this will be his only distinction. But the Lord hath spoken the word, and the earth, which has been defiled by man's sin, must wax old and vanish away; and all the proud and haughty inhabitants of it must perish. All the miseries which in every age have been experienced, are the effect of that curse, which is incurred by transgressing the law of God, and violating his righteous covenant. His wrath, like fire, consumes all before it: it will burn up the earth, and it forms a hell for the everlasting punishment of the wicked. There all mirth will cease; no joy can enter; even hope expires at the portal; all is destruction and despair, weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth for ever. Let then the merry-hearted, who now drink wine with festive songs, and add every incentive to sensual indulgence, pause, and consider, what they will do to eternity, when all such expedients fail? Even in this world an hour may come in which strong drink may be bitter to them that drink it, and every enjoyment cease or become irksome: but at length carnal mirth must be turned into mourning and anguish of spirit; and how much better now to mourn with penitent sorrow, which makes way for holy hope and endless joy, than to spend eternity in hopeless wailing and gnashing of teeth! As no nation has ever been visited as the Jews were after they had broken their covenant and crucified the Lord of glory: so in this world communities, and hereafter individuals, will be punished with a severity proportioned, not only to the crimes which they have perpetrated, but to the advantages they have abused: and they who change God's truths and ordinances for their own conjectures and inventions, will be condemned as the most heinous of those who have broken his everlasting covenant, or refused to accede unto it.

V. 13—23.

There hath in every age been a remnant which have escaped the contagion of impiety and wickedness, and have been preserved from general destruction; but, alas! they have hitherto been only as a gleaning. They, however, can sing God's praises and glorify his name, in the hottest fires of persecution, and in all places whither they can be driven. They see and adore the majesty of God, in those dispensations which overwhelm the wicked; and they should excite each other to abound more and more in his pleasant service. Let us bless God, that we have heard songs, ascribing glory to the Lord our Righteousness, in this isle of the seas, this uttermost part of the earth: but we have also reason to lament, that the number of true Christians among us is so small, and that our own graces and holy duties are so feeble and defective. These things should humble us, and form our chief trouble, being the causes of all our other sorrows. The difference, however, betwixt the weakest believer and every unbeliever is essential: the former shall surely be preserved, the latter cannot possibly escape the perdition of ungodly men, when the windows of heaven shall be opened to pour down vengeance, and the foundations of the earth shall shake, and it shall sink under the weight of man's transgressions, to rise no more. Happy then are they who take warning by the sentences denounced against or executed on others; for as surely as the predictions against the unbelieving Jews took effect, and were exactly fulfilled; so will every impenitent sinner sink under the weight of his transgression, and rise no more. But the mystery of providence is not yet finished: many kings with their armies must fall before the power of the divine Redeemer: the ruin of his enemies must make way for the universal establishment of his kingdom; then the Sun of Righteousness will appear in his meridian glory; and all other real or pretended luminaries will be eclipsed and confounded, and "all kings shall bow down before "him, all nations shall do him service."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1. The prophet here praises God, not only for mercies already received, but in the prospect of the accomplishment of the prophecies which he had just delivered: for the vengeance to be executed on the Jews and other opposers of true religion, was intended for the benefit of the church, to which every believer is more nearly related, than to any man or body of men after the flesh. Rejoicing in JEHOVAH as his Portion, as well as his Governor, and penetrating into the most distant futurity; the holy prophet conceived the most exalted ideas of the divine perfections, and determined to extol them in the loftiest strains of praise. His wonderful works to Israel in former times, and those far more glorious works which Isaiah viewed as already performed, accorded to God's counsels of old, which had been revealed in prophecies and promises to his church, and were essentially faithfulness and truth.

V. 2. Egypt had been desolated in order to Israel's deliverance; the cities of Canaan had been destroyed, that they might possess their inheritance; Babylon and Tyre, those defenced cities, full of palaces, inhabited by strangers to God and his worship, would be made a desolation, and never be rebuilt; and even Jerusalem ceased to be the holy city, and became a palace of strangers, after the Jews had rejected Christ, and it was made a ruinous heap. Rome also is doomed to be destroyed, to make way for the universal spread of Christianity. These, and other similar events, seem to have been present to the prophet's mind, when he wrote these words. 'By stran- 'gers, are meant heathens, aliens from the commonwealth 'of Israel, and enemies to it.' (Lowth.)

4 For [g] thou hast been a Strength to the poor, a Strength to the needy in his distress, [h] a Refuge from the storm, a Shadow from the heat, [i] when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall.

5 Thou [k] shalt bring down the noise of strangers [l] as the heat in a dry place; even the heat with the shadow of a cloud: the [m] branch of the terrible ones shall be brought low.

6 ¶ And [n] in this mountain shall the LORD of hosts [o] make unto [p] all people a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, [q] of wines on the lees well refined.

V. 3—5. These wonderful displays of divine power and justice, will induce many potent or fierce and terrible nations to stand in awe of God, and render glory to him. The accomplishment of some of the prophecies against Babylon had this effect on the Persian kings: (Ezra i. vi. vii:) and this was a shadow of the future conversion of the nations unto Christ. It will then appear most evident, that the Lord hath from age to age protected his Church of humble, poor, and despised believers, in all their distresses, and against every persecutor. When the fury of their enemies menaced their destruction, as the violent hail-storm drives against the wall; his power preserved them, as in a strong tower, both safe and undismayed, till the tumult of their foes was silenced in destruction. And when temptations resembled the sultry heat of the sun, in the sandy desert, he interposed his protection, as the shadow of a cloud, till the heat was abated: and the flourishing prosperity of their most terrible assailants was at length brought low.

V. 6—8. These verses evidently contain a prophecy of the provisions, and the preaching of the Gospel, from the coming of Christ to the end of the world. The Lord of hosts would make a feast; (Marg. Ref.) in the mountain of the Lord's house, on mount Zion, the type of the true church. This feast would be provided for all people, Gentiles as well as Jews, and would consist of the choicest viands, in great variety and plenty, and of the richest wines, well refined by continuing long upon the lees. Under these emblems all spiritual blessings, as conferred through his atonement and mediation, are shadowed forth. At Jerusalem, the partition-wall betwixt Jews and Gentiles was broken down by the crucifixion of Christ: and thence the Gospel was diffused through the nations of the earth. Thus the ignorance and idolatry, which, like a veil or covering, were spread all over the nations, would be removed, torn, and at length destroyed. This was begun by the conversion of the Gentiles in the days of the apostles, and hath been in some degree carried on by the propagation of the Gospel, dispelling heathen darkness, to this present day: and at length the knowledge of God shall cover the earth, as the waters do the sea. This will continue almost to the day of judgment; when by the glorious resurrection of all believers to eternal life, and the final confinement of sin and misery to hell, "death will be swallowed up in victory;" or, "to eternity." (1 Cor. xv. 54. Rev. xx. 14.) Then all tears will be wiped away, by the Lord himself, from the faces of all his people; every reproach will be removed from their character; an end will be put to all correction and rebuke; and from the whole earth they shall be gathered into his kingdom.

V. 9. When Immanuel appeared on earth, those who waited for him, welcomed him as their God and Saviour: as others became acquainted with him, they were ready, with Thomas, to confess to him, "My Lord, and my "God," and to rejoice in his salvation. The church yet waits for him to come and set up his kingdom, and to turn all her mourning into joy; being prepared to welcome that event with triumphant praise, "honouring him, even "as the Father that sent him." Every believer expects his final appearance, as "the great God, and our Saviour." (Tit. ii. 13.) And when he shall come, and all the nations of the earth shall wail because of him; these words will express the very heart of every one of his redeemed people; as about to receive the completion of his salvation, and the fruition in body and soul of his expected felicity.

V. 10—12. Every enemy of the church, like Moab, shall be trodden down as the straw upon the dunghill: (a most energetic similitude to show the contempt that will be poured upon them,) and the Lord shall extend his powerful hands, on every side, to crush his foes; as the swimmer stretcheth forth his hands to their utmost extent, to support himself on the water. Thus he will abase their pride, and spoil them of their prosperity; and reduce to the dust all their strong holds, and their most determined opposition.—Perhaps an allusion to Christ, as lifted up on the cross, with his hands extended and nailed to it, might be intended, under the figure of the Lord's stretching forth his hands in the midst of his enemies. Then and there he spoiled and triumphed over the powers of darkness, and ensured the victory over every enemy for himself and his church. (Col. ii. 14, 15.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

True faith simply credits the testimony of God, and relies on his immutable truth to perform his promises; and thus the believer anticipates, and praises the Lord for, future blessings as if already in possession. This faith influences every one, who has it, to holy obedience and spiritual worship; and if we can on this ground be confident that the Lord is our God and Portion for ever, this will animate us with the desire of exalting and praising him amongst our fellow-sinners.—All his wonderful works of creation, providence, and redemption, accord to his eternal counsels. He hath already shown many of these counsels, which he revealed to his servants the prophets, to be faithfulness and truth; and in due time all the rest will be evidently accomplished. Frequently he has reduced powerful cities and splendid palaces into ruinous heaps, never to be rebuilt; because of their oppression of his people Israel. But since that nation crucified their Messiah, these interpositions in their favour have ceased; for ages they have been oppressed with apparent impunity; Jerusalem itself has been made a heap; and the Lord's care has been transferred from them to the Christian Church: and at the predicted time, He will again make of the defenced city a ruin; that the strong people may glorify him, and reverence his holy name.—The Lord ever was, and ever will be, the Refuge of poor and distressed believers: and having provided them a shelter from the storm of his righteous judgments, and taught them to flee to it: all the powers of earth and hell may in vain unite their force and fury: their tumult shall be silenced, their fury disappointed, and their pride and terrible power shall be brought low: whilst the poor servants of God shall enjoy inward consolation in the midst of trouble, and at length a triumphant deliverance.—When the Father loved us, and gave his Son to be the propitiation for our sins, he prepared a feast for our souls: the believer finds that "the flesh of Christ is meat indeed, and his "blood drink indeed;" and deriving from him pardon, peace, and a joyful hope, his soul is satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and exhilarated as with the richest wines. Yet this is only an antepast of that eternal feast which is intended him; and there is no sinner of any nation who should not be invited to this feast, and assured of a hearty welcome, if he come for it in the appointed way. Blessed be God, the Gospel has already rent in many places the thick covering, which has spread over the nations, and our land is favoured with a glorious light: may all the inhabitants of it walk in the light, and be the children of light; and may the Lord destroy entirely the remains of this veil from every part of the Christian church, from the hearts of unbelieving Jews, and from the Mahometan and Pagan nations. This will at length be effected, and the Sun of Righteousness shall illuminate every corner of the earth. At length the Lord will come to judgment, the dead shall be raised, the books shall be opened, believers shall be welcomed as the children of God to their eternal inheritance, "death will be swallowed up in victory," God shall wipe away all their tears and rebukes, and they shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. In the day when they shall arise from the grave, and see their divine Redeemer come to perfect their felicity, with what energy of gratitude, love, and joy, will they exclaim, "Lo this "is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save "us: this is JEHOVAH, we have waited for him, we will "be glad and rejoice in his salvation!"—But the same almighty arm, which is engaged to save his Church, is stretched forth to destroy all his despisers. He will then tread them under foot, with the utmost disdain and abhorrence. Those hands, which once were extended on the cross, to make way for our salvation, will be extended to destroy all impenitent sinners. Then his victory over the devil and all his proud and potent servants, will be completed, every strong hold will be levelled, and the last enemy put under the Redeemer's feet. "Therefore, my beloved "brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable, always abound-"ing in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know "that your labour is not in vain in the Lord."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVI. V. 1. The prophet seems still to keep in view the whole series of predicted events which hath been considered. The preservation of Jerusalem from the Assyrians, the return of the Jews from Babylon, and their deliverance from the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes, if at all meant, could only be regarded as types or earnests of more spiritual and glorious events. For the day here especially intended, seems to be that future season, when the New Testament Babylon should be laid low and levelled with the ground. Then "this song shall be sung "in the land of Judah," by the converted Jews, or in the church of God: "We have a strong city," the "Jerusalem from above," which is far stronger than Babylon or Rome; for "salvation hath God appointed for "walls and bulwarks;" the power, truth, and love of God, in Jesus Christ, render his church an impregnable fortress.

V. 2. The decisive victory obtained over antichristian powers will prepare the way for the immense enlargement of the church. They who embrace and hold fast the truth, as it is in Jesus Christ, become a righteous nation, incorporated under his government, united among themselves, obedient to his laws, and safe under his protection. (Marg. Ref.) Every new convert is enrolled as a citizen of this strong city, and ministers and Christians should open the gates: that he may be admitted to dwell in it and share its franchises—The calling of the Gentiles, in the primitive times, was a partial accomplishment of this prediction: but it will be more fully performed, when the Jews shall be converted to the Saviour, and the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in.

V. 3, 4. "Thou preservest continued peace to the "mind that leaneth on thee," &c. 'This is to be taken 'for a man who with his whole thought and soul confi-'dently leans on God, through Jesus Christ, as it is ex-'plained at the end of the verse.' He stays and rests his hope on the Lord's wisdom, power, truth, and mercy, in all his undertakings, difficulties, and perils; and refers his concerns to him, expecting direction, assistance, success, and comfort from him. And thus the Lord keeps him in perfect peace, or "in peace, peace." In every kind of peace, peace of conscience, tranquillity, resignation, and cheerful expectation, proportioned to the degree in which the heart is thus stayed on God. Therefore an exhortation is annexed to "trust in the LORD for ever," or perpetually and for eternity: "for in JAH JEHOVAH, the self-"existent and unchangeable God, is everlasting Strength:" He is the Rock of ages, or of eternity, (Note, Deut. xxxii. 3, 4.)—This seems addressed to the church, to encourage her to wait patiently under her persecutions, in full expectation of the glorious times predicted.

V. 5, 6. As the fall of Babylon was connected with the restoration of the Jews; so the total ruin of antichristian powers and of Rome, will make way for the established peace and prosperity of the church. This the Lord will speedily accomplish: the poor and needy will soon trample upon the ruins of the strong-holds of antichrist, and the most despised instruments, the witnesses who prophesy in sackcloth, and their despised followers, shall be able to execute the Lord's purposes.

V. 7. Whilst the ungodly know not at what they stumble, the righteous Lord makes the way of his upright servants plain and level: he removes obstructions and stumbling-blocks; he proportions their strength to their trials; he watches over their steps, and guides them in the way of uprightness. (Marg. Ref.) "Thou wilt make equal "the path of the righteous."

V. 8, 9. The prophet here declares how the servants of God behaved under their difficulties. They waited the performance of his promises, in the way of his commandments, or while enduring his chastisements. (Marg. Ref.) Their chief desire was to know and glorify his name, and to see him glorified, to keep his perfections and wonderful works in remembrance, and to act as in his immediate presence. Each of them could say before God, that, in their retirements, and in the darkest seasons of adversity, they had sought him and his favour, with their inmost souls and as their great concern: and they had witnessed or expected the desolating judgments, that had wasted, or would waste, the nations, in hope that the inhabitants would learn righteousness by means of them. 'Even in the night sea-

10 Let [z] favour be shewed to the wicked, yet will he not learn righteousness: [a] in the land of uprightness will he deal unjustly, [b] and will not behold the majesty of the LORD.

11 LORD, [c] when thy hand is lifted up, [d] they will not see: but [e] they shall see, and [f] be ashamed for their * envy at the people; yea, [g] the fire of thine enemies shall devour them.

12 ¶ LORD, thou wilt [h] ordain peace for us: [i] for thou also hast wrought all our works † in us.

13 O LORD our God, [k] other lords besides thee have had dominion over us: [l] but by thee only will we make mention of thy name.

14 They are [m] dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise: therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, [n] and made all their memory to perish.

15 Thou hast [o] increased the nation, O LORD, thou hast increased the nation: [p] thou art glorified: [q] thou hadst removed it far unto all the ends of the earth.

16 LORD, [r] in trouble have they visited thee; [s] they poured out a ‡ prayer when thy chastening was upon them.

17 Like [t] as a woman with child, that draweth near the time of her delivery, is in pain, and crieth out in her pangs; so have we been in thy sight, O LORD.

18 We have been with child, [u] we have been in pain, we have as it were brought forth wind; [x] we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth; neither have [y] the inhabitants of the world fallen.

'son, when others sleep, hath my soul been taken up with 'thee.' (Bp. Hall.) "I will seek thee at the dawn of day."

V. 10, 11. Hardened sinners "despise the riches of the "Lord's goodness and long suffering:" and prosperity renders them less disposed than ever to receive the instructions of righteousness: so that in Israel, the land of uprightness, where the means of grace were afforded and good examples set, men continued unjust and profane, and shut their eyes to all the discoveries of the glorious power and holiness of God! Even his hand, when lifted up to inflict gentle punishments, or to threaten more terrible vengeance, was wilfully disregarded, and his judgments were ascribed to other causes. But the Lord would constrain them to see his hand, and to be ashamed of their envy and enmity to his people, by causing the fire prepared against his enemies to devour them: or, "They shall see with shame the zeal "of thy people: yea, the fire shall burn up thy adversa"ries." This may be considered as the language of believers, acknowledging the justice of God, in giving up the Jews into the hands of the Chaldeans. It accords also to the conduct of that nation, previous to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: and it will be verified in a still more stupendous manner, in those great events, which seem to be more immediately predicted.

V. 12—18. The church here addresses the Lord. Whatever desolations he brought upon hypocritical nations, he would certainly ordain peace for his true people: he had wrought "all their works in them;" they were of that kind which his grace produces: or "for them;" He had hitherto made them to triumph over their enemies, and rendered their endeavours successful. (Marg. Ref.) They had indeed often been subjected to other lords, who not only enslaved their bodies, but usurped authority over their consciences, and harassed them with persecutions: but now, by the grace of God, they were determined to make mention, as his worshippers and servants, of him alone; to have done with their idols, superstitions, and iniquities; and to expect from him only, complete deliverance from all oppressors. We may suppose this intended as the language of the church, in that crisis, when the New Testament-Babylon shall be destroyed, and the complete victory over all remaining antichristian powers expected. (Rev. xviii. xix.) Their chief seducers and oppressing tyrants were now dead, and they would no more arise to usurp authority over them: (Note, Rev. xx. 5, 6.) for the Lord had visited and destroyed them with infamy. The righteous nation beforementioned was greatly increased, and God was glorified; and instead of being confined to Judea, it was extended to all the ends of the earth. This was done in answer to the prayers of his people in former times: when troubled by their persecutors and chastened for their sins, they waited on him, and poured out fervent supplications before him for deliverance. For a long time the church had been like a travailing woman that endureth all the pangs and anguish of child-birth, without obtaining the expected deliverance. Thus, under long delays, the pious remnant had been in great distress, and waited with wrestling prayers and anxious expectation for the predicted deliverance, till they were ready to conclude, that those glorious times would never arrive; that they had misunderstood the prophecies; and had conceived false hopes which would produce nothing but painful exertions and distressing disappointments: for they had not been able to effect any important deliverance from their enemies, neither had the inhabitants of the world fallen, either into willing subjection to Christ, or as crushed by his power.

V. 19. (Notes, Ez. xxxvii. 11—14.) The conversion of the Jews; the spiritual resurrection elsewhere predicted; (Rev. xx. 4.) the flourishing of the church that had seemed dead through the corruptions of popery; and the prevalence of infidelity, seem here especially foretold. We may consider Christ himself as the speaker, and addressing the church: his resurrection from the dead was the earnest of all the future deliverances that were predicted; and they are the continuation of that power which was then exerted.—But the church is generally considered as addressing God. Her cause is his also: they who have been put to death for his righteousness sake are his dead men, and shall live: he will recover her, as a dead body laid in the grave is miraculously raised to life again; by fully restoring her prosperity. For the power of his grace, (like the dew, or rain, that causes the herbs that seem dead to revive,) would be effectual to raise her from the lowest state of depression.—'The Hebrew runs thus, "My dead "body shall arise." The noun is singular,—the verb 'plural.—The two sentences are equivalent; they are 'called the church's dead, as members of that mystical 'body; and Christ's dead,—from the interest he hath in 'them, and because he hath promised to raise them up at 'the last day.' (Lowth.) In this figurative resurrection the deceased saints arise, but not the deceased persecutors. (14. Note, Rev. xx. 5, 6.) The last clause may be rendered, "the land of tyrants shalt thou cause to fall," or, shall she cause to fall; that is, the church shall prevail against all oppressors, and cast them down. The original word is often translated giants. 'It appears from hence, that 'the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was at that 'time a popular and common doctrine: for an image which 'is assumed, to express or represent any thing in the way 'of allegory or metaphor, whether poetical or prophetical, 'must be an image commonly known and understood; 'otherwise it will not answer the purpose for which it is 'assumed.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 20, 21. The Lord, by his prophet, exhorts his people, through successive ages, when under persecutions, to wait with cheerful expectation for these glorious events. Let them retire from the world, and by faith and prayer, take refuge in him, and patiently wait the event. Thus, as Noah in the ark, as the Israelites in Egypt eating the passover, or as one sheltered in a secret chamber, they would be safe and uninterrupted amid the heaviest storms: and in a very little time, the vindictive wrath of their enemies and the corrections of their Father, would terminate. For the Lord was about to remove from his mercy-seat, (his place in Israel) to the righteous tribunal, in order to pass sentence and inflict punishment on the wicked; but especially upon the murderers of his people: and then the immense quantities of blood, that had been shed in war, persecution, and oppression, would be disclosed, and the murderers receive condign punishment. Let any one carefully compare this chapter with the latter part of the Revelation, from the sixteenth to the twentieth chapter inclusive; let him especially consider the vengeance to be executed on those "who were drunk with the blood of the martyrs of "Jesus;" and then let him determine whether the prophet Isaiah, and the apostle John, do not predict precisely the same events.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—11.

The citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, whose names are written in the book of life, are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. The immutable promise and oath of the Lord, securing the everlasting covenant, and all his infinite perfections engaged for its accomplishment, are the impregnable walls and bulwarks of this strong city, which will still stand secure, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up. He himself has given orders, that the gates of this city should be open to every one that keepeth the truth, and by repentance and faith becomes one of the righteous and holy nation, which is governed by our incarnate Immanuel, whatever his former character or kindred have been: and his ministers should take care that every hinderance to the establishment of the humble believer may be removed, and that sinners may be encouraged to join themselves to the Lord. Blessed indeed are they who trust in God! Proportioned to our holy confidence in him, shall be our unspeakable peace: and he deems himself bound in honour to answer the expectations of all who renounce other dependencies, to rely on his faithful word. Let us then acknowledge him in all our ways, rely on him in all our difficulties, and fear no enemies: for if the LORD JEHOVAH, in whom is everlasting Strength, be for us, who can be against us? By him, the poor of his people shall set their feet upon the necks of their most insulting enemies: and in prospect of that victory, we should triumph in his praises during our sharpest conflicts. But he to whom these privileges belong, walks in the even path of uprightness. Our righteous God abhors hypocrisy; and, as in perfect faithfulness he directs the path of the just, so he weighs and detects that of the deceiver, and appoints him his portion with the unbelievers. They that trust in the Lord, must also wait on and for him in his ordinances, expecting his promised blessings at the appointed time; and if his favours and the discoveries of his glory be desired as our felicity, they will solace us in solitude and affliction; nay, we shall then especially seek the Lord with earnestness, and with our whole heart. The believer knows in his own case that corrections are the means of producing a teachable disposition, and submission to the will of God: and this encourages his hope and prayer, that the miseries, which he witnesses on every side, may be sanctified to the inhabitants of the world, that they may learn righteousness. Yet he cannot but observe, that neither prosperity nor adversity alone will produce this happy effect: for numbers, who hear and profess the Gospel, and are conversant with the most honourable Christians, continue to do wickedly; nay, to envy the people and hate the holiness of God. On such, alas! mercies and corrections are alike unavailing: and they close their eyes and hearts against conviction, till his wrath destroy them; and then they will see, and be confounded on account of their wickedness and madness. Let us then most earnestly beg of God to prepare our hearts unto himself, and to number us amongst his chosen people.

V. 12—21.

If the Lord work in us a penitent, teachable, believing, obedient disposition; he will ordain peace for us, and cause all to work together for our final good. For we have all been under the dominion of other lords, and have willingly served them: but the true Christian relies on grace alone, renounces all his former masters, and purposes henceforth to serve the Lord and him only: and he will as surely be made victorious over every domineering lust, as the church will triumph over every usurping tyrant; and at length rejoice, that they are all extirpated, never more to revive, or give him any further disturbance. But in this life the believer hath much trouble from the remaining power of sin, and is often exposed to painful correction; yet this puts vigour into his prayers, and keeps him a constant supplicant at the throne of grace. Sometimes, however, he is ready to conclude, that all his efforts are vain, and that no deliverance hath been or can be effected. But let him persevere in watching, prayer, and steady resistance to temptation, though again and again foiled. The power of God will revive his drooping graces, and destroy his strongest enemies: soon death will terminate the conflict, the soul will then join the assembly of just men made perfect; the body shall at length be raised from the dust, no longer corruptible, subject to disease, or contaminated by sin; but spiritual, holy, and glorious, and bearing the image of the second Adam the Lord from heaven. Thus the church also shall at length be victorious in her long continued conflict with successive generations of implacable foes; and they will all be overwhelmed with infamy, or sink into oblivion. The prayers of ancient believers have been answered, the church has been vastly increased, and God hath been glorified in enlarging her boundaries to the ends of the earth. Yet they were sometimes apt to conclude that their hopes and prayers were in vain. At present the church continues in troubles, through the prevalence of impiety and iniquity: but numbers are pouring out their prayers, under divine rebukes, for more complete deliverance. Let us never fear lest these travailing pains should produce nothing but wind and confusion, though the kingdoms of the earth be not yet become the kingdoms of Christ. The hopes of the disciples of old seemed to be buried in the Redeemer's grave: but beyond expectation, he revived, and their hopes revived with them. The same power will perform every remaining promise and prophecy, till death be swallowed up in victory. The grace of our God can soon render this barren wilderness like the garden of Eden: his providence can readily remove every obstruction: and nothing can be impossible to him, whose voice shall at length be heard by all that are in the graves, and they shall come forth to everlasting life, or everlasting damnation. Let us then keep close to him, and separate from the world; let us give ourselves unto prayer, and seek our comfort in secret devotion: thus we shall be safe from indignant foes, and may cheerfully expect the blessings promised in the word of God. Thus even the grave will form a chamber to hide us from the power of the enemy, until the indignation be overpast, and our full redemption cometh. But let the ungodly tremble at these words: the Lord is at hand to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: he will then detect every secret wickedness, and no heart can conceive the discoveries which shall be made, when "the earth shall disclose "her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." Let then sinners flee from the wrath to come, whilst the Judge is upon the mercy-seat, dispensing pardons: speedily he will remove to his awful judgment-seat, from which he will denounce and execute deserved punishment upon all unbelievers: but especially on those who have shed the blood of his saints and martyrs, from enmity to his holy image and holy religion.

NOTES.

and especially the persecutors of his church; he will also inflict vengeance on Leviathan. (Rev. xix. 17—20. xx. 1, 2.) Persecuting tyrants, ambitious conquerors and oppressors, and idolatrous empires, are often represented in scripture, under the emblem of destructive animals, especially as leviathans and dragons; and preceding deliverances of the church by the destruction of her oppressors may be alluded to. (Marg. Ref.) Yet the punishment of Satan, rather than that of any of his agents, at the crisis before mentioned, seems more immediately predicted. From the repetition of the word leviathan, it appears not improbable that more than one terrible animal was called by that name; (Notes, Job xli;) and the word rendered dragon, is translated elsewhere sea-monster. (Lam. iv. 3.) Many people and nations are meant by the sea, and Satan the old dragon gave his power to the beast which the apostle saw rise out of the sea. (Rev. xii. 7—12. xiii. 1. 4. xvii. 15.) This great enemy of God and his church is the most terrible and destructive of creatures. Immense subtlety, malice, and power unite in him. He has long fatally deceived all the nations of the earth, except the remnant, "whose names are written in the book of life of the Lamb "slain from the foundation of the world;" (Rev. xii. 9. xiii. 3:) so that he hath dwelt among them and reigned over them as their god and prince: and his chief seat, as spoken of in these prophecies, has long been fixed in that great city, which, one way or other, has always affected to rule over the nations. (Rev. xvii. 18.)—'He prophesieth here 'of the destruction of Satan and his kingdom, under the 'name of Leviathan.' But God will at length make the sword of his almighty vengeance, which is exceedingly sharp, and great, and strong, to reach unto him. Then the old serpent will be bound and cast into the bottomless pit, his power will cease, his obstinate servants will be cut off, and the earth be overspread with truth and righteousness.

V. 2—6. When these events begin to take place, let believers sing unto, or concerning, the church. "A vine-"yard of red wine:" that is, of the most valued wine. The visible church will not then bear wild grapes, but excellent fruit in abundance. (Notes, v. 1—7.) The Lord will guard it night and day from harm, and water it every moment with the influences of his Spirit. He never was angry with his church in the same way that he is with his enemies, and then his anger will be turned away from her, (Note xii. 1;) his severest judgments are not intended against the vines, but against thorns and briers; the hypocrites within and the enemies around the visible church, who set themselves in battle against him. These are fuel for the fire of his vengeance, and he will go through and burn them up together with the utmost ease. (Marg. Ref.) But if any one fears this destruction, let him by faith and prayer, arrest, as it were, the uplifted arm of God's strength, and seek forgiveness and reconciliation and protection; and he shall surely find them. But whatever become of individuals, the nation of "Israel will certainly "take root, and blossom, and bud, and cover the face of "the world with fruit." Probably the fall of antichrist, forming a remarkable fulfilment of the prophecies, will be a mean of the conversion of the Jews; and this event will prepare the way for the universal spread of the Gospel. Then all nations will be grafted into that olive-tree, of which Abraham, or Israel, was the root, and thus this prophecy will have its exact accomplishment. (Marg. Ref.)—'These words are a description of the flourishing 'state of the Jews after their conversion, which shall be "as life from the dead," as St. Paul expresses it, and shall 'occasion the fulness of the Gentiles coming into the church, (Lowth.) (Notes, Rom. xi. 12—36.)—What event has yet occurred, that can be thought a fulfilment of this prophecy in its plain and full meaning?

12 And it shall come to pass in that day, that the LORD shall [f] beat off from the channel of the river unto the stream of Egypt, and [g] ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel.

13 And it shall come to pass in that day, that [h] the great trumpet shall be blown, [i] and they shall come which were ready to perish in the land of Assyria, and [k] the outcasts in the land of Egypt, [l] and shall worship the LORD in the holy mount at Jerusalem.

V. 7—11. The punishments of Israel, though dreadful, have not been like those of their oppressors. Amalek has been utterly destroyed. The Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Macedonian, and Roman empires, which successively harassed and oppressed them, have been in succession subverted, and the conquered people lost among the conquerors. But the Jews yet continue a distinct and numerous nation; an unparalleled instance of a people surviving so many ages all their conquerors. They are evidently preserved as monuments of the truth of their own scriptures, as well as of the New Testament; and in order to the performance of the ancient prophecies concerning them. So that, after all the massacres that have been made of them, they have not been "slain according to the slaughter of "them that slew them." When the Lord sent forth the afflicting stroke on Israel, he did it in measure, and debated with them under their sufferings: when he caused the rough and chilling east wind to blow, he stayed it; that is, he would not suffer any national judgments to extirpate them: nay, their calamities were intended for their reformation; these national punishments in some sense expiated their guilt as a collective body, and they would be made effectual to purge away the pollution of their sins. Thus when the Chaldeans took away the brass of their altar, and burnt the stones of it with the temple and city, as it were, to lime, their groves and images were also destroyed, and their idolatry was finally abolished. This was the effect of their calamities, as graciously over-ruled for the good of the survivors; and not the condition of their pardon, as some explain it. The Lord, however, had determined that Jerusalem must be desolated, and the land be left altogether uncultivated. This dispensation would resemble the pruning of a vine; when the worthless branches are either devoured green by the cattle, or gathered up for burning after they are withered. (Note, John xv. 6.) The wicked Jews would, in vast numbers, be devoured by their enemies, and consumed by the fiery indignation of God. For, being wilfully destitute of understanding, and refusing to profit, either by the warnings, judgments, or mercies of God, they would be exposed to the utmost severity of his justice; without any compassion being shown them, on account of their relation to him, either as his creatures or as his professed worshippers. This has been far more awfully verified in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and in its long continued consequences, than it was by the Babylonish captivity.

V. 12, 13. These verses predict the restoration of the Jews after the captivity; and under that typical event, their recovery from their present dispersion. At Cyrus's proclamation, they, "whose hearts the Lord stirred up," "from the channel of the river Euphrates, to the river "of Egypt," (Note, Gen. xv. 18—21.) (that is, from all the different places, in which they were scattered,) were gathered one by one, as fruit is beat off from the tree: and thus they, who had been in the most abject servitude, in the land of Assyria, or Chaldea, and the poorest of them especially, with many of those of the ten tribes, and some of the outcasts who had taken refuge in Egypt, returned to rebuild the temple, and worship God at Jerusalem. But the preaching of the Gospel seems especially to be intended by the "blowing of the great trumpet." (Note, Num. x. 1—10.) By this, the Lord will collect the abject and outcast Jews, from their present dispersions, into his church, number them with his accepted worshippers, and probably reinstate them in their own land.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The sword of avenging justice in the hand of omnipotence will readily reach, penetrate, and execute condign punishment on the stoutest and most sagacious enemies of God; and every offender's misery will be proportioned to the talents and power which he abused, and to his malice, enmity, and extensive or durable mischievousness: and as the devil and his angels will assuredly be tormented for ever in the lake of fire, let none of his servants expect to escape the same doom, if they continue in their sins. When Satan shall be restrained, and his determined factors cut off, the people of God shall flourish, and believers will abound in joyful songs of praise. The Lord will always value his true church, on account of the precious plants with which he hath stored it, and the precious fruit that it produceth to his glory. May our souls, as belonging to it, be continually watered and kept, that we may abound in "the fruits of the Spirit, in all goodness, righteousness, and "truth!" The Lord never punishes unreasonably or excessively, as men do in a fury or passion: His anger is removed from every believer, and he waits to be gracious to all who repent and seek his face. But briers and thorns are as able to resist the devouring fire, as the hypocrite or infidel is to stand in judgment before him, or out-brave his vengeance. Flight, concealment, or resistance are in this case alike unavailing; nor can the sinner escape, but by drawing near to his offended Lord, humbly confessing his sin, and casting himself wholly upon his mercy through Jesus Christ: thus he disarms his resentment, effects a reconciliation, and engages omnipotence on his side. If we are ingrafted into the living vine, we should expect and pray for that time, when the progeny of Jacob shall again take root in a fruitful soil, and shall "bud, and blossom, and fill the face of the world with fruit." Indeed we may in some sense be said to be bound in gratitude to pray for the conversion of the poor Jews, and to promote it, by kind usage, argument, and earnest persuasion. Through that nation we have received the lively oracles of God; the condition of it for many ages past, forms the most incontestable proof of their divine original; and the Jews live among us as a continued warning and instruction. No people hath ever so suffered, and been so preserved: but there is yet a blessing in the root, and their conversion will be as life from the dead to all the nations of the world. Then the great trumpet shall every where sound; unnumbered multitudes of perishing sinners shall be gathered to Christ, through converting grace, and shall worship the Lord in spirit and in truth. Whilst we expect those happy times, let us recollect, that the Lord does not deal with his professed worshippers as he doth with his avowed enemies. He so moderates every storm of persecution or affliction, that the church shall weather it out. The afflictions also of each believer shall be so appointed in measure, and be attended with such instructions and a blessing, that they will tend to purge away iniquity and to promote his sanctification: thus the fruitful branches are made more fruitful, while hypocrites are broken off and cast into the fire: and when death shall utterly demolish the poor body, sin shall be finally extirpated from the true Christian, and the body shall be raised, to share with the soul eternal holiness and felicity. But in this world we must have tribulation: no man can fence out trouble; and they whose troubles are not subservient to sanctification, will find them terminate in eternal misery. Now the Lord is upon a mercy-seat, and they only have understanding, who seize the present opportunity of reconciliation to him: for when he shall remove to his tribunal, he will have no mercy on, and show no favour to, any of his creatures, who would not in this life know and consider the day of their visitation.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—4. This chapter begins a new subject, principally relating to the Assyrian kings, and the devastations of Israel and Judah by them. Ephraim was the chief of the ten tribes of the kingdom of Israel: their rich valleys were full of fruitful vineyards; Samaria was situated on a hill at the head of them; and its strength and beauty were as a crown and a glory, of which the people were very proud.—There seems to be an allusion to the garlands of flowers, with which the drunkards used to be crowned and adorned at their revels, in which they were overcome and stupified by wine. Shalmaneser was the mighty and strong one, whom the Lord had prepared to cast them down by his hand, like a hail-storm or inundation. Then their crown of pride and their drunkards would be trodden together under feet: their honour and beauty would be as a fading flower, and they would be greedily devoured as the first ripe fig, which being discerned when no other fruit is to be had, is hastily seized and eaten up immediately.

V. 5, 6. At the very time when Israel was finally ruined, Judah had a transient return of prosperity under the government of Hezekiah. He trusted in God, and aimed to reform his people. The Lord of hosts was the crown, and honour, and beauty, of Hezekiah and of the residue of believers in Judah: and for their sakes he endued their magistrates and counsellors with the spirit of discernment and equity, and gave courage and conduct to their captains, who led forth their troops out of the gate of Jerusalem, or to attack the gates of their enemies.

V. 7, 8. Even in Judah, and after Hezekiah's reformation, iniquity was very prevalent. The Jews too were addicted to intemperance; and not only the common people, but likewise both the priests and prophets, were given up to drunkenness. (Note, Lev. x. 9—11.) This swallowed up their judgment and conscience, so that they taught false doctrine, fell into most atrocious errors, and decreed unrighteousness: and through their example, the nation was generally led to wallow in drunkenness, their tables were every where polluted with it, and scarcely any place was clean from it. There was, however, a remnant of another character, and for their sakes the city was spared.

V. 9—11. The pious king of Judah, Isaiah, and other prophets, were very desirous of instructing the people: but they were so hardened in vice, and so early initiated into it, that there were scarcely any who would give them a hearing; except they could teach the infants that were hanging upon their mothers' breasts. Or the people were so intent upon their pleasures, that they must be torn from them to receive instruction, as the infant from the breast: and they would no more understand what was taught them than children. It was also necessary to use much repetition, to dwell long upon every topic, and to teach the people a little on one occasion, and a little on another, as they were able to bear it; because of their ignorance and unteachableness. But this disgusted many of them, who seem to have turned the instructions of the prophets into ridicule: and having catched up some detached expressions, such as these here used, and which have a remarkable alliteration in the original; they, contemptuously mimicked their language and manner, and entertained one another by taking them off. Therefore the Lord determined to teach them by the Assyrians and Chaldeans, who might indeed stammer out insults and menaces in the Hebrew tongue, but would in other things speak a language which they could not understand: for he would use these strangers to scourage such as refused to hear his word. (Notes, Deut. xxviii. 49. 1 Cor. xiv. 21, 22.)

V. 12, 13. The prophets had pointed out to the people the true way of finding rest and comfort, amid their enemies and trouble, by trusting and waiting on God; but they refused to hearken: and therefore, the constant and frequent instructions which they treated with contempt, hastened and aggravated their condemnation; causing them to depart still further from God; till they were broken by their enemies, snared in their own policy, and taken in Satan's net. (Marg. Ref. Notes, viii. 11—15.)

V. 14, 15. When the prophets denounced the vengeance of God against the people, they seem to have made a jest of it; especially the scornful rulers of Jerusalem, and the priests and prophets before mentioned. They boasted that they were in league with death and hell, (Marg. Ref.) and should be safe, even when the judgments of God deluged the land. For they had formed such confederacies, and devised such politic schemes, as would secure them; though the prophets called them refuges of lies and falsehood; though they were grounded in deceit and hypocrisy. Perhaps this may refer to some league, which they were attempting to make with Egypt to assist them against the Assyrians. 'Our arts of cunning and falsehood will secure 'us, in the most difficult times. They are not supposed 'to have said thus much in express words, but this was 'their true meaning.' (Lowth.)

V. 16. This gracious promise, introducing the subsequent denunciations of approaching judgments, was well suited to encourage the pious remnant, that the Assyrians should not prevail against Judah, as they had done against Israel. (Note, vii. 14.) 'This prophecy cannot belong to 'any but Christ, to whom it is often applied in the New 'Testament. But it may import thus much, with re'spect to the time wherein Isaiah lived; that he should 'never be disappointed who believed in God, whose dwel'ling was in Zion; and had made peculiar promises to the 'Jewish church and kingdom, which would be eminently 'fulfilled at the coming of the Messiah.' (Lowth.)—The person and salvation of Christ are, in this remarkable prediction, represented under the figure of a Foundation, on which some magnificent structure was about to be erected. For the spiritual temple is built on him, with the whole plan

17 [i] Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet: [k] and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, [l] and the waters shall overflow the hiding-place.

18 And [m] your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; [n] when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be * trodden down by it.

19 From [o] the time that it goeth forth it shall take you: for morning by morning shall it pass over, by day and by night: [p] and it shall be a vexation only † to understand the report.

and purpose of God for glorifying his great name, in the salvation of sinners: as well as every human hope of future happiness. This Foundation was laid in Zion, where the Lord dwelt upon his mercy-seat amidst his chosen people. JEHOVAH himself laid it, according to his eternal counsels and predictions from the beginning; by the incarnation of Christ, by carrying him through his work, by exalting him in human nature to the throne, and by sending the Gospel to the nations. This Foundation is a Stone of such stability and excellency, as to support the immense and glorious edifice, which is to endure to all eternity. It is a tried Stone, approved of God and of all his saints and servants. It is a Corner-stone, compacting together the whole building; a precious Corner-stone, in the sight of the Lord, and of every believer: and a most sure Foundation; so that every one who in any age or nation believes this testimony, and rests all his hopes and his immortal soul on Christ, shall never be put to flight or confusion, as one that is in haste to escape impending danger: for he shall be safe, and know himself safe, and shall quietly wait the salvation of the Lord. (Notes, Rom. ix. 33. Eph. ii. 19—22. 1 Pet. ii. 4—8.) The Septuagint renders the last clause, "shall not be ashamed;" and it is thus quoted in the New Testament. 'He that believes shall rest himself 'contented with this all-sufficient means of his comfort 'and salvation; and shall not either hasten to look out 'for other helps, nor be ashamed of trusting to this.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 17—19. The judgments, coming on the scornful rulers and people, are here contrasted with the safety and well-grounded confidence of every believer. For the Lord was about to execute impartial justice on the wicked, according to his strict and holy law: as the builder carries on his work by the line and the plummet. Then the storm of his indignation would sweep away every false confidence; the presumption of the scorners would end in despair; they would be trodden down by the instruments of his vengeance; destruction would march forth against them, and come nearer and nearer by day and by night: and the very report of their miseries would be a vexation and terror to all who heard of them. The calamities and alarms occasioned by Sennacherib's invasion, and his gradual approach to besiege Jerusalem, might be a partial accomplishment of these predictions. But neither that event, nor even the Babylonish captivity, nor any of their calamities till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, after their obstinate rejection of Christ, the Corner-stone, fully answers the import of these verses.

V. 20. 'A proverbial saying; meaning, that they will 'find all means of defence and protection insufficient to 'secure them, and cover them from the evils coming upon 'them. The beds were only mattresses laid on the floor; 'and the coverlet a sheet, or in the winter a carpet, laid 'over it, in which the person wrapt himself.' (Bp. Lowth.) Neither the confederacy of the Jews with Egypt, nor any of their politics, could defend them against the Assyrians or Chaldeans: neither their temple, altar, sacrifices, nor Pharisaical righteousness, could recommend them to God's favour, when they rejected Christ: nor could their numbers and fortifications defend them against the Romans, when God forsook them and became their enemy.

V. 21, 22. 'The destruction of the Philistines is 'compared to a breach of waters: the same resemblance 'which is here used!' (Marg. Ref.) 'These extraordinary manifestations of God's power at Perazim and 'Gibeon, were for the deliverance of his people, and the 'destruction of their enemies,—but now God will act 'contrary to his usual proceeding of grace and mercy, and 'employ his power in destroying his own people.' (Lowth.) Perhaps his most extraordinary interposition, in cutting off the army of Sennacherib, in answer to Hezekiah's faith and prayer, and after the hopes of unbelievers had failed, may be here alluded to. But his strange work, which the Jews took it for granted he never would do, was the rejection of them from being his people, numbering them among his enemies, and rising up for their destruction by the Romans, as he had done against the Canaanites and Philistines. The prophet therefore warns the people to cease from deriding the word of God, lest they should be bound in strong bands unto the execution of his righteous indignation: for he had certainly heard from the Lord of hosts, that he had determined a consumption upon the whole land. The Babylonish captivity was here predicted, but not that event alone: for the prophets addressed by their writings those of succeeding generations, as well as those to whom they were more immediately sent. (Acts xiii. 40, 41.)

V. 23—29. The dealings of God with Israel and Judah, and with different descriptions of men, are here illustrated by apt similitudes, to which the prophet demanded their earnest attention. The plowman varies his work as the case requires, not plowing every day: he prepares the ground for the seed, and sows it with different kinds of pulse or grain, each in its appointed spot, the wheat in the principal place, as being most valuable. And when he hath gathered in his harvest, he knows how to separate the corn from the straw and the chaff, according to the methods of the time and place in which he lives; and to the nature of the grain, that he may not injure it, but prepare it for his use. Thus the Lord, who hath given man this wisdom and discretion, must himself be wonderful in counsel and excellent in operation. As the season and occasion requires, he threatens, corrects, spares, shows mercy, or executes vengeance. He distinguishes between one character and another with the greatest exactness; and orders every thing according to the counsel of his own will, and for his own glory: he appoints his various dispensations, for the due correction of his people, and their separation from his enemies and their sins: he will take care that no trials shall eventually injure his servants, but he will utterly destroy his enemies, when the proper time arrives.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

All that glory and beauty, of which men are proud, will prove a mere fading flower: and that affluence, which is considered as a crown and ornament, frequently tempts to excess, and thus disgraces its possessor. They who are overcome by wine, are overcome by Satan; for all drunkards are his slaves, and must sink under the final wrath of God, except they repent. The Lord will abase all the proud: but they who pride themselves in wickedness will be rendered peculiarly contemptible. When vengeance is to be executed on the ungodly, God has many mighty instruments at his command, who readily bear down and devour all before them. Happy then are they alone, who glory in the Lord of hosts himself. His favour and image, communion with him, and communications from him, suffice to enrich the poorest and ennoble the meanest; they form a crown of glory and diadem of beauty, superior to any distinctions and decorations of earthly monarchs and conquerors; and thence his people derive wisdom, strength, and courage for every service and for every conflict. Thus some are qualified for the ministry, and others for the magistracy; and others to defend their country, or lay down their lives in the cause of God. (Note, xi. 1—5.) Whilst the Sovereign of the world leaves some guilty nations to fill up the measure of their iniquities, and gives them up to ruin: he raises up eminent reformers, and preserves a remnant of believers in other nations, whose prayers and labours prolong their tranquillity. Yet every attempt to promote true religion has hitherto been attended with vast discouragement. Even under the most scriptural means of grace, multitudes have continued ungodly, and have copied the example of the open enemies of God, rather than that of his most honoured servants. And, alas! the ministers of religion have frequently been the ringleaders in impiety and scandalous intemperance: and when they are swallowed up of wine, no wonder that they wander out of the way, teach false doctrine, stumble in judgment, become blind guides, and go before those to the pit of destruction, whom they have misled by their erroneous teaching, and hardened by their flagitious example. Thus excess and riot become common, till no place be clean from filthiness; men's ears are turned away from the truth, and are turned unto fables; and the few who are able and willing to teach the people knowledge, and to cause them to understand doctrine, find them alienated from them and entirely unteachable; having the incapacity, levity, and heedlessness of children, without their simplicity. In such circumstances the most scriptural and rational method of inculcating divine truth, by repeated plain instructions and particular cautions, warnings, and exhortations, will excite disgust: and they who are too much engaged in excess or dissipation, to bestow any pains to understand the word of God, absurdly set up for critics, and censure or ridicule the ablest ministers, who give themselves wholly to their work! To keep themselves in countenance, they watch for something in the language or gestures of the minister, which they can distort and deride; and thus they quiet their consciences in despising the message of God. Such men ripen apace for destruction: the Lord will teach them by other methods; "for judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools." Indeed evil is before all who refuse to hearken to the proposals of mercy in the Gospel, and to seek the holy rest and consolations which God hath provided for the weary and heavy laden sinner. It is very painful for the minister of Christ to reflect, when he is endeavouring to instruct, convince, warn, persuade, alarm, or encourage his hearers; that numbers of them will thence take occasion "to go and fall "backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken." He must, however, go on, even though scorners be found among rulers; being satisfied that he speaks according to the word of God.

V. 14—29.

When we declare the vengeance of the Lord against such as trust in refuges of lies, we should expect to hear loud clamours against our bigotry and want of charity; and scornful infidels will divert themselves and each other, even with the most scriptural denunciations of hell and damnation! They have no fears in that respect, and deride those that have, as men of narrow, weak, and superstitious minds: and they speak and act as if indeed "they had "made a covenant with death, and were at agreement "with hell," and were secured against the vengeance of God; having made those things their refuge which we are sure are lies and falsehoods, as certainly as that the Bible is the truth of God. He hath laid one Foundation, and no man can lay any other: this is tried, approved, and precious; and he that believeth shall never be confounded. But let men contrive and endeavour whatever they please: if they do not build on this Foundation, and be not interested in the incarnate God and Saviour; if his person, character, and offices, be not precious to their souls, their hopes will be found delusion and presumption; the storm of death and judgment will sweep away their refuges of lies, and overflow their hiding-place; their covenant with death shall be disannulled; and the execution of the righteous sentence of God, according to his holy law, will be so dreadful, that the very report of it is sometimes, even now, intolerably vexatious to them. For whatever men trust to for justification, except the righteousness of Christ; or for wisdom, strength, and holiness, except the influences of the Holy Spirit; or for happiness, except the favour of almighty God, will be found "a bed that is shorter, than "that a man can stretch himself on it, and a covering "that is narrower, than that a man can wrap himself in "it." Let sinners then fear becoming mockers, lest they be bound in the strong cords of their own iniquity; for the Lord hath decreed the destruction of all ungodly men, throughout the whole earth. But men presume because God spares them from day to day: not knowing that he hath his method and seasons of operation; and knoweth how to deal with all his creatures, as may best answer the purposes of his glory. For he who giveth natural wisdom to the husbandman, (as well as spiritual wisdom to the believer,) is himself wonderful in counsel, and excellent in working. He hath not yet made all ready for the great day of account: and the sinner hath not yet filled up the measure of his crimes, nor performed his part in God's universal plan; and therefore he is spared. His people are not yet fully purified from their sins, and have not yet sufficiently shown the power of his grace; and therefore they are kept in tribulation. But he "knoweth how to "deliver the godly out of temptation, and to reserve the "wicked to the day of judgment to be punished." The visible Church is his husbandry, and the professors are the corn of his floor mingled with the straw and chaff: but he knoweth how to make a separation by means of trials and persecutions; he will so moderate these that they shall do his people no harm; when their end is answered they shall cease; his "wheat shall be gathered into his garner, "but the chaff shall be burnt with unquenchable fire."

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1, 2. Jerusalem is here called Ariel, which signifies the lion of God: and some think that it refers to the standard of Judah, which was a lion, or to Christ the Lion of that tribe, or to the strength of the city. But probably it relates to the altar of burnt-offering, which consumed the sacrifices as a lion devours his prey. Perhaps the Jews sometimes called the city by this name; and trusted that it would prevail against every assailant, because of the sacrifices there offered. But though David had taken it from the Jebusites, fixed his residence there, and removed the ark of the covenant thither; yet God denounced a wo against it. And though the people continued from year to year to observe their solemn feasts, and to multiply their sacrifices; yet the Lord would surely distress the city, and fill it with trouble and sorrow; and it should be unto him as Ariel. As the altar, flaming with the sacred fire, consuming the oblations, and surrounded with the blood and carcasses of the sacrifices, was a discovery of divine justice in the punishment of sin; so should Jerusalem be, when filled with slain men and consumed by fire. This doth not allow us to interpret this chapter exclusively of Sennacherib's invasion. He distressed Jerusalem, but did not render her like the altar of burnt-offering. 'The hearth of the altar, which Ezekiel plainly 'calls by the same name.' (Ez. xliii. 15, 16.) 'Go on 'year after year, keep your solemn feasts; yet know that 'God will punish you for your hypocritical worship.' 'It 'shall be all on flame, as it was when taken by the Chal-'deans; or covered with carcasses and blood, as when 'taken by the Romans; an intimation of which more dis'tant events, though not the immediate subject of the pro-'phecy, may perhaps be given in this obscure passage.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'The city which David besieged' (in which 'sense the word is taken in the third verse;) implying that 'the enemy should distress it in the same manner.' (Lowth.)

V. 3, 4. Sennacherib sent an army under Tartan, Rabsaris, and Rabshakeh against Jerusalem; but it does not appear that they closely besieged the city: and it is expressly said that Sennacherib should not encamp against it. Again, when the Assyrian chiefs approached Jerusalem. Hezekiah sent ambassadors to them; yet they made no humiliating submissions, but having heard Rabshakeh's insulting and blasphemous menaces, they answered him not a word. (Marg. Ref.) No doubt numbers of the Jews were extremely dejected, and ready to make any submissions: but the language of these verses seems to imply that the city should be closely environed, and at length taken, and laid even with the ground: and in this full meaning, the prophecy had its accomplishment, when Jerusalem was destroyed by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans.—It is very natural to suppose, that many of the surviving Jews, when thus reduced to extremities, would in the most abject manner beg their lives of their haughty conquerors. Instead of their former confident and presumptuous language, they would express themselves with the most timid and servile entreaties and doleful complaints; like those that had familiar spirits, who affected to speak in a feeble, shrill, whining tone, as if from the belly; or as if the voice came up out of the earth, while they lay grovelling on the ground.

V. 5, 6. These predictions seem to relate to all the subsequent calamities of the Jews, till the final ruin of Jerusalem. Sennacherib's invasion formed the first fulfilment of them; and many circumstances in their plain and full meaning belong to that event: but the prophet was led to use language, which was afterwards exactly accomplished, but could be understood only in a more general and qualified sense of the distresses occasioned by those invaders. Sennacherib's army, composed of various nations, all strangers to God and Israel, terrible for courage and ferocity, and insolent through success, seemed innumerable as the dust: yet they would be driven away suddenly as the chaff, and vanquished by a single blow. Their approach to Jerusalem was, however, a visitation from God, and occasioned terror and alarm, like thunders, earthquakes, storms, and tempests, and was destructive as a devouring fire. Or the Assyrian army may be meant, (before called thy strangers:) and the sudden and dreadful slaughter of a hundred and eighty-five thousand men at once by the angel, may be predicted. (xxx. 30—33.)—Perhaps there is also an intimation that the Jews, not profiting suitably by their deliverance from the Assyrians, would afterwards be destroyed in this manner. The last siege and taking of Jerusalem was attended by dreadful thunders, earthquakes, &c.

V. 7, 8. The transient joy and speedy ruin of the enemies of the Jews and of the church, are here represented by a very beautiful simile. A man, who, being hungry or thirsty, falls asleep and dreams that he is eating or drinking, seems to enjoy much pleasure from the visionary gratification: but it soon vanishes, and his craving wants and faintness continuing when he awakes, his disappointment aggravates his uneasiness. Thus the multitude of the nations, who through succeeding generations fight against Mount Zion, where God's altar or worship is established, have their enmity gratified by transient successes; and, as it were, dream with pleasure of effecting the destruction of the church: but the delusion soon vanishes, and leaves them disappointed and miserable. Not only was Sennacherib's army destroyed, and his sanguine hopes frustrated; but the Assyrian, Babylonian, Macedonian, and Roman empires successively declined and came to ruin, after they had fought against Mount Zion; and thus it must be with every nation and individual, that engages in that unequal contest.

V. 9—12. The Jews were here called upon to pause, reflect, be amazed, and cry out as in bitter anguish, on account of the judgments that were coming on the nation. They were, and would be intoxicated with presumption and false doctrine, and rendered insensible to their danger: and the Lord would make them drink of the cup of his indignation, till they staggered as drunken men. (Marg. Ref.) Because they despised his word and rejected his salvation, he had poured upon them the spirit of deep sleep, and given them up to judicial blindness; and especially their prophets, rulers, and teachers of every kind, were covered with darkness, as if hood-winked; so that the visions or prophecies which were sent them, though plain enough in themselves, were utterly inexplicable to them. (Note, vi. 10, 11.) Their learned men, when asked to interpret them, being blinded by their prejudices and passions, excused themselves on account of the book being sealed; intimating that the predictions were so enveloped in obscurity, that, if there were any meaning in them, it could not be discovered. And the poor alleged their want of learning, as the reason of their contempt and inattention: so that in fact the oracles of God became of no use to them. The apostle applies this to the state of the Jews in his days; (Rom. xi. 8.) And doubtless it had its principal accomplishment, when the chief priests, scribes, Pharisees, and Jewish nation, rejected and crucified their promised and long expected Messiah, and persecuted his apostles and disciples; and in the state of that nation to this present day; whilst, with the scriptures of the prophets in their hands, and being conversant in the letter of them, the book is so sealed, that neither the learned nor unlearned among them can discern, that they were fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth.

V. 13—16. Many of the Jews through successive ages adhered to the external worship of God, and thus honoured him with their lips: but in general their hearts were alienated from him through the love of sin; and their religion was induced, or regulated, merely by regard to human authority. Thus, in the days of Hezekiah, and their other pious kings, they adhered to the temple-worship, and kept their solemn feasts: but when the precept of man no longer called them to the sanctuary, they turned to idolatry. In the days of Christ, they were very tenacious of their forms; but the traditions of the elders rendered the commandment of God of none effect; and almost all their religion consisted in superstition and hypocrisy. (Note, Matt. xv. 8, 9.) The Lord would therefore proceed to do a marvellous work: he would entirely give up their teachers and counsellors to be infatuated to their ruin; leave Jerusalem to be desolated, and cast off the Jews from being his people. All schemes to hide their iniquity, or to varnish over their malice under specious pretexts, as if they could impose on God and hide their character from him; all their perversions of his word, to establish their own traditions; and all their opposition to his counsels, to support their own authority and reputation, would be as ineffectual, as if the potter's clay could attempt to disannul, or find fault with, the work of him that wrought it. They could no more resist his will, than the clay could that of the potter: he could as easily defeat their schemes, as the potter alters the shape of the clay. They could no more succeed in their enterprises, when God rejected them, than the clay could become a vessel by its own energy; or change the shape into which the potter cast it, whether he had formed it a vessel unto honour or to dishonour.—'The most refined 'arts of their deep politicians, shall not avail;—and their 'learnedest men shall lose their judgment and discretion.—'This was remarkably verified,—when their crucifying 'Christ, out of fear of the Roman power, brought the Ro-'mans upon them: and their learned Rabbies ever since have 'minded little else but fabulous stories, and their Cabalists 'have vented trifles for profound mysteries.' V. 17—19. These verses seem wholly to relate to the rejection of the Jewish nation, and the calling of the Gentiles. In a little time, Lebanon would become Carmel; the uncultivated forest would be a fruitful field: that is, the neglected Gentile nations would be favoured with the good seed of the word of God, and yield a plentiful harvest of true converts: at the same time, the field, which had long been tilled and yielded fruit, would be esteemed a forest; that is, the nation of the Jews would be rejected, and left without the means of grace, to become barren and desert. Then they, who before were deaf to the voice of God, would hear and understand the words of that book which was sealed up from the unbelieving Jews; and the poor blind heathens emerging from their obscurity and darkness, would enjoy the marvellous light of the Gospel. (Acts xxvi. 17, 18.) Perhaps the miracles of Christ, and his apostles also, might be alluded to. Then the teachable, the meek, and poor in spirit, and the poor and afflicted of this world, would rejoice more abundantly in the Lord, because of the wretched condition from which they had been delivered; nay, would be more joyful, than believing Jews had in general been.

V. 20, 21. By "the terrible one," we are to understand 'the foreign enemies of God's people: and by the scorner, 'those skeptics and infidels,—who made a mock at God's 'messengers.'—'Who condemn men for speaking the 'truth, as they often served the prophets.'—'The judges 'executed their office at the gates of the city.' (Lowth.) No doubt this was the case, in the days of Isaiah and at many other times: it is evident, that when our Lord came, the rulers, priests, scribes, and sanhedrim of the Jews, most exactly answered this description. Herod, the king of the Jews, persecuted Christ as soon as he was born: the others despised and derided him; they lay in wait to find some accusation against him; they watched for and perverted his words, and laid snares for him when he publicly reproved their sins; being determined to condemn him for any word which they could lay hold of: and they turned aside, rejected, and crucified this Just One, on the most frivolous pretences. They behaved in the same manner to his apostles and ministers, and were the chief persecutors of the Christians, till Jerusalem was destroyed: then that terrible enemy came to nought, and was cut off; and this tended to establish Christianity, and to increase the joy of believers. The words may also be applied to the subversion of the Pagan persecuting Roman empire, which tended further to the promulgation of the Gospel.

V. 22—24. God did not intend to reject all the posterity of Abraham and Jacob, that these redeemed servants of God should be as it were ashamed and wax pale. The Jews, who embraced Christianity would acknowledge the converted Gentiles, as the work of God's new-creating grace, and as their spiritual children: and their believing descendants would be excited to trust, honour, and worship the Holy One of Jacob, with greater fervency, for this vast accession to the church. Multitudes even of these Jews, who had erred in spirit, and murmured against Christ, and malignantly opposed his Gospel, would at length come to a better temper, and understand and receive his doctrine: nay, at length, the whole Jewish nation will be converted to Christ, and readmitted into the church.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

External privileges and distinctions will not exempt from wo, any that are destitute of true godliness. Men may persist in an attendance on wearisome and expensive forms, nay, even on the ordinances of God, and glory in their supposed relation to him; when the whole arises from pride and hypocrisy. When he encamps against the strong holds of his adversaries, they will soon be brought low. Such as refuse to humble themselves before him in submission to his righteousness and obedience to his will, will soon be abased to the most extreme distress: and none are more abject in adversity, than such as are insolent and scornful in prosperity. The Lord employs wicked men to chastise his people, and to avenge himself on hypocrites; and numbers are ready enough for such services. But at the same time he prepares sudden destruction for them also: and his enemies shall be visited with vengeance more tremendous, than earthquakes, thunders, tempests, or conflagrations can suggest to the imagination. All their sanguine expectations and transient joys, will be like a pleasing dream. Speedily will they awake from their soothing delusions; and if they continue till death, they will then lift up their eyes in hell, and not find one drop of water to cool their tongue. But the disappointment and misery of those who fight against the Church, and exult in the expectation of destroying it, will be most aggravated. And every nation, that involves itself in the guilt of persecution, lays the axe to the root of its own peace and prosperity.

V. 9—16.

The wickedness of professed Christians may well excite our attention, astonishment, and lamentations. Pride, ambition, avarice, lust, or any head-strong passions, produce a perfect intoxication of the soul: and so do erroneous principles in religion: hence originates the most inconsiderate and infatuated conduct, by which men rush on their own destruction. This should caution them not to sin against conviction, not to scoff at divine truth, and not to lean to their own understandings or hearts, and so despise his teaching and salvation; for thus God is provoked to pour on numbers the spirit of deep sleep, or strong delusion: then they grope at noon day, as if it were mid-night; and the most learned and sagacious, without excepting priests, rulers, and teachers, are covered with impenetrable error and ignorance. To such persons the Bible becomes absolutely a sealed book: and when the learned find that they cannot understand it, and make it accord to their conjectures, they impute it to its want of correctness and consistency: and either wholly reject or neglect it, or pervert it by presumptuous alterations and unnatural comments: and the unlearned are glad of such a sanction to their ignorance and impiety. Instead of despising the poor Jews, who have long been left in this situation, we ought to look to ourselves, and take warning by their example. And let us remember that the Bible is in some measure a sealed book to every man, learned or unlearned, till he begins to study it with child-like simplicity and docility; daily praying that the Lord would "open his "understanding, that he may understand the scriptures." Alas, what multitudes in this Christian country fall even below the hypocritical Jews in religion! They do not so much as draw near to God with their mouths, or honour him with their lips: nay, the authority of laws, or royal proclamations, fails of inducing them to pay a little decent respect to the name and the day of God. And of those who are not openly profane, it is to be feared that numbers are mere formalists, whilst sin and the world possess their hearts; and their religion is only a compliance with established customs, and regulated in subserviency to reputation and interest. Yet, let it be observed, that those wanderings of mind, and that defect of reverence and devotion, which are the believer's burden, are very different from the aliear tion of heart from God, here so severely reproved: fo- the former consists with sincerity, though it is a lamenta ble proof of imperfection. As sinners grow hardened in hypocrisy, impiety, or infidelity, their presumption increases. And hypocrites especially cannot be convinced, that God intends to do so marvellous a work, as to punish them for their wickedness. Those wise and prudent men, who have not the wisdom which comes from him, are often strangely infatuated, and fall into practical, and even into speculative, atheism; and speak and act as if they could hide their sins, their intentions, or their true character, from God, or frustrate his counsels. But they will find themselves in his hand, as clay in the hand of the potter: and as they can have no fence against his power; so their rebellion against his authority, and contempt of his truth, will tend to the display of his justice in their condemnation. By such conduct many professing churches, (as well as that of the Jews,) have provoked God to bereave them of their advantages; and the blessings of salvation have been communicated to others.

V. 17—24.

When the Lord teaches, the deaf hear his word, and the blind see out of obscurity. When he comforts, the meek, the poor, and the persecuted increase their joy in him; and that holiness of his character, which sinners hate and dread, inspires believers in their happiest hours with confidence and exultation. When by his power terrible persecutors and presumptuous scorners are cut off, the church enjoys peace. And let such as watch for iniquity, and scrutinize the actions of Christians and ministers with malicious severity, in order to find matter of accusation; who wait to catch at some word from their lips, for which they may make them offenders; who lay snares for those that boldly and honestly reprove sin without respect of persons; and who revile and persecute the righteous on every trivial occasion: let such men recollect that they copy the example of these scornful Jews, and of those who crucified Christ, persecuted his disciples, and brought upon themselves swift destruction. But the Lord will replenish his Church, and never suffer any of his redeemed servants to be ashamed, or to wax pale, by witnessing the permanent triumphs of his enemies. Numbers of children are already raised up to Abraham, from among the poor Gentiles: may we be found of the number, and experience his new-creating power! May we see increasing numbers sanctify the Holy One of Israel, and fear his name! And may they who now err in spirit, and murmur against his truth, come to understand and learn doctrine, till the whole earth be filled with the glory of our God and Saviour!

NOTES.

CHAP. XXX. V. 1. The propensity of both Judah and Israel to form alliances with idolaters, and especially with Egypt, being directly contrary to the law, and inconsistent with dependence on God for protection against all enemies, evinced them to be rebellious children, who acted unsuitably to their relations to God: and probably both were intended, (Deut. xvii. 16.) Hoshea, king of Israel, made an alliance with So, king of Egypt, which brought ruin on himself and his people; and perhaps this prophecy was delivered about that time; when the princes of Judah also might be consulting together, to make a similar league against the formidable Assyrian power, (Note, 2 Kings xvii. 9.) But there is no proof that Hezekiah actually entered into this alliance; nor is it probable that he would, in opposition to the word of God by his prophets: indeed, it is likely that this very message by Isaiah prevented the design, which might otherwise have had terrible consequences. (Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 5, 6. 21—23.) The princes and people, however, seem to have been bent on the measure: and instead of asking counsel of the Lord by his high-priest or prophet, or regulating their decisions according to his word; or taking refuge under his protection by repentance, faith, and prayer, (which the Spirit of God would have led them to;) they added sin to sin, by proposing to form a league with the Egyptians. The words rendered cover with a covering, may mean, pour out a libation, and some explain them of ratifying a covenant with that ceremony: but, as the custom of ratifying covenants with a libation was a religious observance, and among the Gentiles an act of idolatry; it can hardly be supposed, that Hezekiah would comply with it, or that he would have escaped reproof if he had. Perhaps, however, the king of Israel had gone so far, and many of the Jews were ready thus to add sin to sin.

V. 2, 3. "Who set forward to go down into Egypt." (Bp. Lowth.) Perhaps some ambassadors from Judah had set out on their journey; but Hezekiah, receiving this message from God, and recollecting that he had not consulted him in the measure, recalled them. The people, however, were disposed to put Pharaoh and Egypt in the place of God, by relying on them for protection, and trusting under the shadow of their wings. (Note, xviii. 1.) But this would surely end in confusion and disappointment.

V. 4, 5. Hoshea's ambassadors came to Zoan and Hanes, or Tehaphanes, to attend on the Egyptian monarch, and concluded a treaty with him: but the Egyptians gave him no effectual assistance, and he and all his people were put to shame for confiding in a nation that could not profit them, but were a reproach to them; for this alliance eventually hastened their ruin. And thus, the prophet intimated, it would be reproach and ruin to Judah, if they proceeded to copy their example. Most expositors take it for granted, that Hezekiah's ambassadors are meant: but Judah is not particularly mentioned; nothing is elsewhere recorded of a treaty actually entered into by Hezekiah with Pharaoh; Hezekiah's character, as trusting in the Lord more than all before him, seems not to admit the supposition; and it was very natural to place the example of Hoshea and Israel, with their Egyptian alliance and its consequences, before the Jews when eager to seek help from the same quarter. The previous steps taken by the princes were sufficient to give occasion for Sennacherib's taunt on the subject; but Hezekiah's confidence most certainly was placed in God, not in Pharaoh: and if the Egyptians and Ethiopians interrupted the progress of the Assyrians, it does not thence follow, that Hezekiah made and persisted in an alliance with Egypt, in opposition to the warnings of the prophet.

V. 6, 7. "The burden of the beasts of the south" means the loads of treasure, which the Israelites, or Jews, or both, carried on camels and asses, southward into Egypt to purchase the assistance of that people. These were sent into "a land of trouble and anguish," in which their ancestors had been greatly oppressed, which was like to occasion much trouble and anguish to them; or which was doomed itself to endure much trouble and anguish. This country abounded with ravenous beasts and venomous creatures; and it is well known that Egypt was remarkable in this respect. The people impoverished themselves to obtain the alliance of that people, which could not profit them; for every effort of the Egyptians would be in vain. Therefore the prophet proclaimed concerning this, (the projected treaty of Judah with Egypt,) that their strength would be to sit still, it would be their wisdom and security to drop the design, and to remain quietly at home trusting in the Lord, and only using lawful means for their safety. But the word here translated strength is Rahab, a name for Egypt, and some think that the prophet meant, that Egypt would sit still, or that it would be more for her interest so to do.

V. 8—11. This solemn command of God to the prophet, to write what follows in a tablet to be hung up, and in a book to be preserved to the latest posterity, implies, that the prophecy related to future generations; though the Assyrian invasion gave occasion to it; the same spirit of rebellion, hypocrisy, and falsehood, which then possessed the Jews, would increase in after ages; and they would more and more refuse obedience to the law of God. They were disposed to suppress the testimony of those prophets, who spake right things, reproving their iniquities, alarming their consciences, and disquieting them in their sins: and they used menaces and reproaches, or bribes and blandishments, to induce them to speak smooth things, and prophesy deceits, which might feed their pride and presumption, and lull their consciences into a false peace. Thus they endeavoured to turn the prophets aside from the path of duty, or to deter them from molesting them whilst they went on in the paths of iniquity. And they especially desired them to desist from mentioning JEHOVAH as the Holy One of Israel. Perhaps they objected to the expression, and pretended to be disgusted with the frequent use of it: but in fact they did not like to hear of his holy character and commandments, his holy hatred of sin and his determination to punish it. They desired that "the Holy One of Israel might cease from before them," and that they might no more be reminded of his justice. If this were the case in the days of Hezekiah, it was much more so previous to the captivity, and most of all before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans.

V. 12—14. The prophet again, and immediately, used the phrase which the Jews had objected to, in denouncing the vengeance of God on the nation. As they despised the word which God sent him to speak, and resolved to trust in oppression, or deceit and perverseness; i. e. in their own deceitful and perverse devices: so this their iniquity would undermine their safety, and render their state like a high wall, in which breaches are already made, and which bulges out, and at length rushes down at once, and the higher it is, the more dreadful the fall. For the Lord would dash in pieces their civil and ecclesiastical constitution, like a potter's vessel, of which no sherd remains, with which fire could be taken from the hearth, or water from the pit. Jerusalem and Judah were not thus dashed in pieces by the Assyrian invasion: nay, the Babylonish captivity was but a partial fulfilment of the prediction; but when the Jews had despised the word of the Gospel, the Lord by the Romans irreparably dashed their state to pieces, and thus it continues to this present day.

V. 15—17. Notwithstanding the heinousness of their sins, and the power of their enemies, the Lord assured the Jews, that in returning and adhering to him and his worship, and quietly confiding in his protection, they should be preserved: or the ambassadors may be addressed, who were called on to return from Egypt and quietly trust in God, who would protect them without the aid of Pharaoh. It is probable, that Hezekiah and a remnant did so, and for their sakes the city was spared: but many would not take this counsel; they were resolved, if possible, to have swift horses from Egypt, (xxxi. 1,) that in case of danger they might flee away: and God declared that they should flee away and be pursued by swift enemies; and be so terrified, that a single assailant should put to flight a thousand of them, and five would suffice to rout their whole army; till only here and there one was left as a sort of prodigy, and like a beacon or ensign placed for a signal on the top of a mountain, or on a high tower. It may be supposed that Sennacherib's army destroyed numbers of those, who would not wait the event in Jerusalem, but attempted to flee elsewhere for safety.

V. 18, 19. Notwithstanding these judgments, the Lord promised to wait to be gracious to his people, as one ready to extend mercy to them whenever they applied to him: he would, as it were, deem this the very end of his being exalted, and his chief glory. For the Lord is a God of judgment, of wisdom, knowledge, and equity, who distinguishes characters, and will by no means involve the righteous in the doom of the wicked; and all that wait for, or expect salvation from him, will be found happy. So that after the approaching desolations the people would still be enabled to inhabit Jerusalem, and frequent Mount Zion: their mourning would cease; and the Lord would be very gracious to them, in hearing and speedily answering their prayers, (Jer. xxix. 10—13.) When Sennacherib's army was destroyed, doubtless the people offered solemn sacrifices of praise on mount Zion, for being permitted still to dwell in Jerusalem: their sorrows were then converted into joy, and their prayers into thanksgivings; because the Lord had been very gracious to them. 'From this verse to the 'twenty-seventh, follow many gracious promises of mercy, 'several of which cannot with any propriety be applied to 'the succeeding times of Hezekiah's reign; therefore we 'reasonably suppose, that the prophet, taking a hint from 'those prosperous times which succeeded this great deliver 'ance, was carried on to a view of better days, which 'might be expected under the flourishing state of the Gos-'pel.' (Lowth.)

V. 20, 21. It is here predicted, that in the midst of poverty and affliction, the Lord would afford the people abundance of good instruction and faithful public teachers; who should not be removed into corners by persecuting princes; so that the people would continually be directed in the right way, and exhorted to walk in it, and cautioned on every occasion not to decline from it on the right hand or on the left. During the reign of Hezekiah the people had much good instruction: but it could hardly be said, that they had "the bread of adversity, and the water of afflic-"tion;" and after his death persecuting Manasseh soon drove their faithful teachers into corners. But after the captivity the Jews continued long in a very poor and destitute condition: yet the Lord sent them many able teachers, especially those that came up with Ezra, and were trained up under him. The priests, Levites, and Scribes were then protected in their work; synagogues were every where erected, and the people were more generally instructed from the law and the prophets, than in preceding times. And though Antiochus Epiphanes, (and others in some degree,) persecuted them; yet the people were duly instructed: and after prophecy ceased, the public teaching from the law and the prophets in all their synagogues, continued without interruption till the coming of Christ: and though it became greatly corrupted by the glosses and traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees; yet it was not utterly without effect. The public preaching, however, of the word of God has become far more general under the Christian dispensation, and has been in some measure preserved during all the ages in which the witnesses have prophesied in sackcloth. 'This may fitly be applied to that plentiful effu-sion of God's Spirit, which is promised under the Gospel.' (Lowth.)

V. 22. Doubtless the deliverance from the Assyrians was followed by strong expressions of zeal against idolatry: and perhaps the Jews treated the images of gold and silver, and all their costly coverings, as a pollution, and cast them away with abhorrence, as afraid of contracting defilement. Yet many Jews even then secretly retained their idols, and the nation soon relapsed. But after the captivity they were totally set against gross idolatry; the prevalence of Christianity alienates men from the idols of the heart; and the recal of the Jews into the church shall be followed by the entire purging of it from all remains of antichristian idolatry.

V. 23—25. Rain to water the ground when sown, and an abundant increase of every valuable production, are here predicted; with large and luxuriant pastures for the cattle, clean provender for such as laboured in plowing the land, and rivers of water even on the tops of the high mountains. We may suppose, that after the immense slaughter of the Assyrians, when their overgrown power, which resembled that of fortified towers, fell to the ground, the land of Judah was favoured with extraordinary fertility: but more sublime and spiritual blessings are evidently predicted. The word of God is the good seed, which being sown in the heart, and watered by the Holy Spirit, springs up in the conversion and sanctification of sinners. When this seed is extensively sown and abundantly prospered, the increase is "fat and plenteous." The Gospel is "the "ministration of the Spirit;" and after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of pentecost, the word of God was preached far more extensively and successfully than ever before: yet to this day a vast proportion of mankind are, in one form or other, servants to sin and Satan: and happier times are evidently foretold. When a country is well cultivated the cattle may feed in rich, yet not generally in large, pastures, (vii. 22—25.) but the emblem aptly denotes the enlargement of the church, as well as the abundant fruitfulness of Christians. The clean provender for the labouring oxen, &c. may imply the suitable provision made for those who "labour in the word and doctrine," in the predicted season, (1 Cor. ix. 7—11.) or that they will feast on those truths and consolations which they preach to others; and that they will be able to separate the pure doctrines of scripture from every corrupt and worthless mixture. Rivers and streams of water are not commonly found on the tops of high mountains: but the emblem implies, that abundant means of grace, accompanied by the influences of the Holy Spirit, would be vouchsafed to those places, which had been most destitute of them, and where they were least expected; and to every one of them. (Marg. Ref.) The subversion of the Jewish state, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, with the slaughter of immense multitudes of Jews, were connected with the calling of the Gentiles, and the extensive propagation of the Gospel. The subversion of the pagan Roman empire, and the slaughter made by the northern nations, made way for its further establishment. But the destruction of all antichristian powers, the slaughter of the determined enemies of Christ, and the subversion of Satan's towers or strongholds, making way for the universal promulgation of Christianity, can alone fully answer the import of the passage. 'This shall be remarkably fulfilled at the time, when there 'shall be a terrible destruction of God's enemies, (Rev. xiv. '20. xix. 21.) when the great ones of the earth shall fall, 'denoted here by high towers; or by towers we may mean 'the fortifications of the city, which is the mystical Baby-'lon.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26. This verse must be explained as an emblematical prediction of spiritual blessings; and nothing previous to the coming of Christ can well be considered as in any respect a fulfilment of it. But then the church, "fair as the "moon," shining by the reflected beams of "the Sun of "Righteousness," began more to resemble him. The Sun, now above the horizon, shone with sevenfold light, diffusing more abundantly and extensively knowledge, holiness, and comfort on mankind: and the Lord began to heal the breaches of the preceding ages. But when at length the church shall be purified from heresy, superstition, and every corruption; when her divisions shall be healed, every scandal removed, and every part replenished with truth, and holiness, and joy: when the Jews shall be converted, the fulness of the Gentiles brought in, all persecution terminated, and the great deceiver cast into the bottomless pit; then this prophecy will receive its entire accomplishment, and not before. The millennium, and not the heavenly state, seems to be predicted.

V. 27, 28. The destruction of Sennacherib's army is here immediately foretold: yet the ruin of all the antichristian powers, in order to the final triumph of the gospel, seems likewise to be intended. We suppose the Assyrian army drawing near to Jerusalem, and the king exulting in confidence of wreaking his vengeance on it; while the inhabitants were either filled with consternation, or engaged in prayer. Then "the name," or glorious power, "of "the LORD came from far," or unexpectedly, to defend his holy city; "burning with his anger," against the blasphemous invader; and about to fall on him, with a weight sufficient to crush him. The sentence which God had denounced when "his lips were full of indignation," was suddenly executed, as if "his tongue had been a "devouring sword; and his breath as an overflowing "stream" of vengeance, reaching to the neck, destroying the mighty army of invaders, and just suffering its head, or commander, to escape for the present. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the Lord "sifted the nations," of which Sennacherib's troops were composed, "with the sieve of vanity," and so brought them to nothing: he put "a bridle in their jaws," forcibly turning them aside, that they might miss their aim. 'Since God's love and hatred naturally result 'from his wisdom, which approves or dislikes things, ac-'cording as they agree or disagree with his own infinite 'perfections; it must follow, that although God be not 'subject to that turbulency and inconstancy,' (excess or defect,) 'which attend human passions, yet his favour and 'aversion must be as strong and vigorous, as lasting and 'permanent, as the highest expressions in Scripture can 'be supposed to import.' (Lowth.)—'The use of the van is 'to cleanse the corn from the chaff and straw; but the van 'with which God will winnow the nations, will be the van 'of emptiness, or perdition; for nothing useful shall re-'main behind; but all shall come to nothing and perish. 'In like manner, the bridle is designed to guide the horse in 'the right way; but the bridle which God shall put into the 'jaws of the people, shall make them err, and lead them in-'to destruction.' (Kimchi, a Jewish writer, in Bp. Lowth.)

V. 29—32. The Jews were here encouraged to prepare songs of praise, such as they were accustomed to use in the night preceding or following their solemn festivals; or when they marched in companies, attended with music, to the temple; and assured that they would soon have abundant reason thus to rejoice and praise God. For he would "cause his glorious voice to be heard," commanding the slaughter of their enemies; the power of his arm lighting upon them would be manifested; and his indignation like fire, tempest, and hail-stones, would destroy them. Thus the Assyrian, who had smitten the Jews as the Lord's correcting rod, would be beaten to the earth: and in all those places through which this staff of his indignation, which seemed to be grounded or established in Providence, was about to pass, and cause great distress to the Jews; there his destruction would be celebrated with tabrets and pipes. For God would fight with him "in battles of "shaking," laying hold of him, and powerfully shaking him to pieces. "The grounded staff," signifies such a rod, 'or stroke, as sinks deep, and makes lasting marks in the 'flesh. The expression alludes to the rod with which the 'Assyrian smote or corrected God's people.' (Lowth.) It does not, however, appear that the original word is often, if ever, used in this sense. Bishop Lowth, on the authority of two manuscripts, renders it, "the rod of correction:" but alterations in the text, where versions and manuscripts, with few exceptions, establish the present reading, are very dangerous; and the difference between grounded and correction, made by changing one letter for another, which is very much like it, shows how the meaning of Scripture might be quite explained away by these apparently trivial alterations. Bishop Lowth seems also to apply the words to the stroke which God was about to inflict on the Assyrians, "The rod of correction, which JEHOVAH shall lay "very heavily upon him:" but how could the vengeance inflicted on the Assyrians and their king be called "the "rod of correction;" when their entire ruin, not their discipline and reformation, were intended?

V. 33. Tophet was a valley near Jerusalem, where children were frequently burnt in the fire to Molech. (Marg. Ref.) It was called also the valley of the son of Hinnom, or Gehenna. 'It is therefore used for a place of 'punishment by fire; and by our blessed Saviour in the 'Gospel for hell-fire. Here the place where the Assyrian 'army was destroyed, is called Tophet by a metonomy; 'for the Assyrian army was destroyed probably at a great-'er distance from Jerusalem, and quite on the opposite 'side of it; for Nob is mentioned as the last station, from 'which the king of Assyria should threaten Jerusalem.' (x. 32.) (Bp. Lowth.) It is also said expressly to be prepared for the king: yet Sennacherib was not slain with his army, though his power and glory then vanished. The certainty and dreadfulness of the destruction, rather than the place of it, seems intended. The large and deep valley, prepared long before for this purpose, supplied with a vast pile of wood and other combustibles, and kindled by the breath of God, as by a stream of burning sulphur, when the blaspheming monarch and his vast army were brought down into it; forms an awful emblem of "the everlasting "fire prepared for the devil and his angels," and for all the enemies of God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—17.

All they who will not ask and follow the counsel of God, are children of rebellion; and so are they who attempt to secure themselves against impending dangers, without obeying his commandments, or relying on his mercy and protection: nor is there any way of avoiding the dreadful consequences of "adding sin to sin," but by making the Saviour's righteousness our covering, and seeking the sanctification of the Holy Spirit. But men have always been prone to depend on an arm of flesh, and to "lean to their "own understandings," rather than to ask counsel of God, and trust in him: yet the event continually shows their wisdom to be folly; their strength weakness; and their confidence a refuge of lies; and that shame and misery are the consequences of departing from God. In general more trouble and expense are bestowed about such things as cannot profit, but must be a reproach to those who adhere to them, than are employed in the service of God: nay, multitudes not only follow the examples of such as have been ruined by their evil courses, but even seek pleasure in those things which have already caused them trouble and anguish, and expect happiness from those persons who are themselves most miserable! When sinners, having been fairly warned and instructed, refuse to hearken, their guilt becomes peculiarly aggravated; and they should recollect that all their rebellions are written in a book before God, to be produced against them at the last day. Hypocrisy is as provoking to God as profaneness; and they who reject and despise the divine law, will derive no advantage from the Gospel. Yet many prefer soothing instructions; they dislike the holiness of God, and his holy precepts, ordinances, and servants, but they have collected some evangelical notions; they cannot be contented to keep entirely from the preaching of the Gospel; and they would prefer such ministers as are of reputation in the church, if they could but induce them to accommodate. They would therefore in part blind their eyes and stop their mouths, that instead of right things, they might speak smooth things, and prophesy deceits. But when neither persuasions nor reproaches can effect this, then they heap to themselves teachers of another kind, and revile and oppose the faithful servants of God. For they want their ministers to leave the direct way of truth and holiness, to walk in crooked paths, and to countenance them, or at least leave them unmolested in their iniquities; and not to speak much of the justice and holiness of God, but to dwell upon his mercy and grace alone, and the privileges of professed believers indiscriminately: without being particular about duties, precepts, hypocrisy, or the wrath to come. But we must not so much as abstain from the use of an expressive scriptural phrase to humour men of this description: we must say, "Thus saith the Holy One of Israel," whether they will hear or forbear: and if they despise this word, and trust in hypocrisy and iniquity, they must be plainly told, that sudden and inevitable destruction is before them. For they who will not repent and turn to God, accept his salvation, and seek happiness in his favour and service, should know that there is no other way, and that all their own devices will hasten their ruin.

V. 18—33.

The same word which speaks terror to hypocrites and infidels, gives encouragement to the broken-hearted, allures sinners to seek the Lord, and ensures the safety of the church. It is not for us "to know the times, or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power:" but he assuredly waits his own time of being gracious to his church, and terminating her bondage: and he ever waits on his mercy-seat to be gracious to all who come to him by faith in Jesus Christ. It is his most glorious prerogative to show mercy; he knows how, when, and on whom, to confer his special favours; and happy are they who wait for him. His people, who dwell in his church below, often weep for their sins and sorrows; but they will soon arrive at the Zion above, and then they will weep no more for ever. Even now he is very gracious to them, and ready to hear their fervent prayers, and grant their largest desires; and they would have more comfort, as well as holiness, if they were more instant and constant in prayer. They who know the value of spiritual blessings, will be reconciled to bread of affliction and water of affliction, should this be their lot; especially if their teachers be not removed into corners, and they be favoured with unrestrained access to the public means of grace. Many of us have the blessing here promised: may we be thankful for it, and duly improve it! and let those that are poor, sick, or in pain, use the means of grace afforded them; and consolation proportioned to their need shall not be with-held. They who drive the ministers of Christ into corners, are answerable for all the heresies and iniquities which in consequence inundate the church and the world. But let us remember that we need the teaching of the Holy Spirit, as well as that of the word of God: and they who simply depend on his promises, and beg to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness, shall, by means of an enlightened understanding, a spiritual taste, and a tender well-informed conscience, hear, as it were, "a voice "behind them, saying, this is the way, walk ye in it," "when they are about to turn to the right hand or the left." And this will appear to be no delusion; as they will learn to hate the most gainful iniquities, and to renounce every idol and sin with determined abhorrence. All temporal good shall be added to those who first seek heavenly blessings, and who desire, above all other things, that the good seed of the word may be sown and watered in their hearts, and produce a large increase; and whose prayer is, that it may be more and more fat and plenteous, and that they may be enabled to live up to the full enjoyment of their largest privileges. If this be our happiness, let us continue to pray for the accomplishment of these extensive and glorious predictions; that rivers of gospel-grace may water all the nations, which have hitherto proved inaccessible to it; that Satan's towers may fall, and his cause on earth be ruined; that the church may shine more resplendent with the glorious light of Christ the Sun of Righteousness; that he may shine with inexpressible splendour through all the regions of the earth; and that every breach of his people may be closed, and every wound healed. This approaching period will be as terrible to the enemies of God, as delightful to his people. Then his glorious name, and heavy indignation, and powerful arm executing his threatened vengeance, will suddenly come upon them, as a devouring fire or an overwhelming inundation; will reach them in the most distant regions and closest recesses, and cover them with disappointment, vexation, and anguish;

WOE [a] to them that go down to Egypt for help; and [b] stay on horses, and trust in chariots, because they are many; and in horsemen, because they are very strong; but [c] they look not unto the Holy One of Israel, [d] neither seek the LORD.

whilst his people shall abound in songs of joyful praise. Every oppressor, by whom the Lord hath corrected his church, will perish like the Assyrian monarch: and every place, that hath groaned beneath the rod of persecution, shall be filled with rejoicing. And let sinners of every rank remember, that, persisting in their iniquity, they cannot escape the wrath of God. For Tophet is of old ordained for the devil, and his angels and subjects; yea, for ungodly kings, as well as inferior sinners: it is prepared capacious enough to hold all the nations that forget God; the wicked will themselves be the incombustible fuel of that unquenchable fire; and the wrath of God, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it. Let sinners then flee for refuge to Christ; that they may be safe and happy, when destruction from the Almighty shall sweep away all the workers of iniquity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1. This chapter coincides with the beginning and conclusion of the preceding one. The Israelites had formed a treaty with Egypt, and the Jews were disposed to do the same: but wo to those of either nation, who confided in that people for chariots, horses, and horsemen; by which they were induced to neglect looking to, and seeking help from God, consulting him, his power and mercy. 'The Lord had commanded the 'Israelites never to return to Egypt, lest they should for-'get the benefit of their redemption; and lest they should 'be corrupted with the superstition and idolatry of Egypt, 'and so forsake God.' These considerations rendered alliances with Egypt peculiarly criminal: but confidence in men, of whatever nation, is departure from God.

V. 2, 3. The Israelites relied on the wisdom and policy of the Egyptians, as well as on their forces: but they should have remembered, that the Lord also was wise; and having denounced their destruction for their iniquity, he would not call back his word, and would easily find means to effect his purpose. For the Egyptians were but feeble men, and their horses mere animals: they could not therefore resist him and his ministering spirits; but would fall down and fail along with those whom they endeavoured to help.

V. 4, 5. The Lord himself would undertake to defend Zion against the Assyrians; so that the Jews would have no occasion for help from Egypt. He would no more regard the number or clamour of the Assyrians, than a young lion does the noise of the shepherds that would drive him from his prey: and as birds defend their young by hovering over their nests, so would JEHOVAH defend and deliver Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.) Notwithstanding the sins of the Jews, he would pass over them, or step between them and the evil that threatened them, and not allow the destroying angel to smite them with the Assyrians; even as he protected the houses of Israel, when he destroyed the first-born of Egypt.

V. 6, 7. The whole race of Israel had revolted from God, with many and great aggravations. The ten tribes were doomed to destruction: but the Jews, being yet spared, were exhorted to return unto him; and it was also predicted, that their preservation from the Assyrians would be attended with zeal against idolatry, and contempt of their idols, even those of silver or gold.

V. 8, 9. The power and army of the Assyrian conqueror fell, not by the sword of the powerful Egyptian, or that of the despised Jew, but by a mighty angel. Sennacherib fled from that invisible sword which had discomfited his choicest troops; and made haste to Nineveh, whither divine vengeance pursued him; his princes also, that escaped, were frighted away, because of that ensign which the Lord displayed over Zion. The fire on his altar, consuming the atoning sacrifices, was the protection of his people, and as a furnace to purify them; but it menaced the destruction of all their enemies.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those possessions, connexions, or dependencies, which prevent men from seeking help and happiness from God, will expose them to indignation and wo. Our proneness to expect assistance or comfort from creatures, shows that we are not duly sensible of their vanity and insufficiency, and of the all-sufficiency of God; and that we do not fully believe, that he will fulfil both his promises and threatenings. But he will assuredly arise against the house of evil-doers, and against the help of those that work iniquity: and they will all fall together before his out-stretched arm. The Lion of the tribe of Judah will appear for the defence of his church, and he will not be abased for the noise of those numbers who encourage each other against him: but no emblems can fully express his terrible majesty and his tender mercy in caring for his people. Let sinners then take warning by the doom, and not follow the steps, of those that have perished in their sins: let us give him our whole heart and renounce all our idols, and he will abundantly compensate all our losses. But terror and destruction pursue and will overtake all the ungodly; and those dispensations and perfections of God, which ensure the sanctification of believers, will consume all unbelievers as in a furnace of fire.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1, 2. This chapter seems to be a detached prophecy, delivered at the close of the reign of Ahaz, and referring to the prosperous reign of pious Hezekiah: though some think, that it was delivered about the time of Sennacherib's invasion. Ahaz and his princes had ruled very wickedly; but a king was about to mount the throne, who would reign in righteousness, employ upright magistrates, and protect the people both from internal oppression by his equitable administration, and from external invaders by his faith and prayers. But this interpretation falls far short of the expressive language employed by the prophet. Christ, our righteous King, and those of his true disciples who exercise authority under him, in church or state, are evidently intended. He alone is the "Man," who shelters sinners from the wrath of God, the temptations of Satan, and the rage of the world; having sustained the storm himself. The consolations and graces of his Spirit are as rivers of water in this dry land: and as the over-hanging rock affords the most complete and refreshing shade from the noon-day sun, to the traveller wearied in the sultry desert; so his power, truth, and love, yield the believer the most complete protection and refreshment in this weary land, through which he is travelling to heaven.

V. 3, 4. Hezekiah's care to have his people duly instructed, would render those, who had any spiritual discernment, clear-sighted: whereas, before, they were enveloped in uncertainty, through the prevalence of ignorance and error. The deliverance from the Assyrians would render the people more attentive to instruction, and their minds more capable of receiving it. Even the inconsiderate and imprudent, would apply their hearts to understand divine knowledge: and they that before could scarcely lisp a broken sentence on such subjects, would learn to speak of them fluently and pertinently. But the superior knowledge, and spiritual gifts and graces of Christ's kingdom, are chiefly intended; and not without reference to his miracles and those of his apostles. 'God shall plentifully afford 'men the light of truth, and give them grace to make a 'good use of instruction.' Those that are weak in faith 'shall come to more perfect degrees of knowledge.' 'The 'most rude and illiterate, such as could not speak so as to 'be understood, shall discourse clearly and intelligibly of 'God and of their duty.' 'That this prophecy chiefly re-'lates to the times of the Gospel, will appear, by comparing 'it with xxix. 18. xxxv. 5. If it be objected that other pro-'phecies foretel the blinding of the Jews under the Gospel; 'we may answer, with St. Paul, that "the children of the "promise are accounted" for the true seed of Israel.'— 'The text may be fitly expounded of the conversion of 'barbarous nations, and their giving praises to God in their 'several languages.' (Lowth.)

[c] things, that virtues shall not pass for vices, nor vices be [c] mistaken for virtues; but men shall be esteemed as they [c] are.' (Bp. Hall.) (Note, v. 20.)—"The fool shall no "longer be called honourable." (Bp. Lowth.) Under wicked monarchs, base men are often preferred and panegyrized by hireling flatterers; but under wise and pious princes they are disgraced and exposed. This was no doubt the case in some degree, under good Hezekiah; but the subjects of Christ are taught to form the most accurate estimate of characters and actions, without regard to outward rank or distinction.

V. 6—8. A man of a vile and selfish temper will speak such things as tend to deceive and corrupt others: his thoughts will be employed to contrive the iniquity that his heart desires; and to cover it with hypocrisy, or to excuse it by principles subversive of the divine law, and destructive of piety. Perhaps perjury is meant by "error "against, (or to) the Lord." (Notes, 1 Kings xxi. 1. 14.) —Thus, instead of relieving the poor, he will devise ways still further to distress them, either to enrich himself by oppression, or for the pleasure of domineering. When such churls get into authority, they will employ instruments and listen to counsellors like themselves; and the magistrates delegated by them will crush the poor by false pretences, even when they have evident reason and equity on their side. Probably this applied to Ahaz and his princes, as what follows did to Hezekiah and his judges: the latter king being of a liberal and equitable disposition, and influenced by the grace of God, devised liberal things for the relief of the poor, and this tended to his own establishment. But the character of Christ and of true Christians, and the use which He teacheth them to make of authority or wealth, as opposed to the conduct of avaricious oppressors, best illustrate the passage.

V. 9—14. These verses are commonly interpreted of the troubles which came upon Judah by the Assyrian invasion; yet some do allow that they also refer to the Babylonish captivity, though out of the order of time; and it is plain, that they speak of more entire and durable desolations, than Sennacherib occasioned. But if we suppose that Hezekiah's reign was predicted, as typical of the kingdom of Christ; we naturally conclude, that the consequences of the Jews neglecting to profit by it were also typical of those, which followed from that nation's rejection of the Redeemer. Thus the transition from the preceding part of the chapter is easy; and we consider these verses as predicting all the troubles of Judah terminating in the Babylonish captivity, and as typical of all the miseries of that nation from the days of Christ, till the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans and their consequent dispersion. It seems that the women of Jerusalem, in those days, were peculiarly vain, luxurious, dissipated and wanton; and regardless of all religion. The prophet therefore especially addressed them, and assured them that many days, and even years, of trouble awaited them: for the provision for their mirth and indulgence would cease: these afflictions would deprive them of their ornaments, and constrain them to gird themselves with the meanest attire; and it would be their wisdom previously to gird themselves as penitents with sackcloth, in preparation for the storm, or, if possible, to avert it. For they would have to lament the loss of their milk, corn, and cattle, as well as wine: the whole land would be over-run with thorns and briers; nay, the places devoted to festivity in Jerusalem, (now rather a joyous than a holy city,) would be thus desolated: yea, the palaces, forts, and towers, being forsaken of their multitude, would for ages become dens for wild beasts, the pleasant abode for wild asses, and a pasture for flocks. The word rendered "they shall lament," is masculine; and probably refers among other things to the weeping of the infants, when their mothers, pinched by famine, and bowed down with distress, could no longer give them suck.—'Ophel,' (the word translated forts) 'was a part of mount Zion, 'rising higher than the rest, at the eastern extremity, near 'to the temple, a little to the south of it. (Mic. iv. 8. Heb.) '—It was naturally strong by its situation, and had a wall 'of its own, by which it was separated from the rest of 'Zion.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 15. The connexion between the preceding part of this prophecy and that which here follows, is very obscure, on any other interpretation except that above given. The Spirit might be in some measure poured out exciting the Jews to repentance and prayer, before their restoration from captivity; by the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the revival of religion there, the wilderness became a fruitful field; and their permanent renouncing of idolatry, and adhering to the worship of JEHOVAH, may be intended, by the fruitful field being accounted for a forest: i. e. the best state of religion in preceding times, was comparatively inconsiderable. But this seems not answerable to the energy of the language. (Note, xxix. 17.) No desolations of Jerusalem or Judah continued until any remarkable "pour-"ing out of the Spirit from on high." But the present dispersion of the Jews, and Jerusalem's being trodden down by the Gentiles, shall continue until a still more abundant pouring out of the Spirit than even on the day of Pentecost, or at the calling of the Gentiles: when indeed the wilderness shall become a fruitful field; and the state of the church hitherto shall be accounted as a forest, in comparison of the glorious times that shall follow. This interpretation is adopted, because no events, that have hitherto occurred, exclusively answer to the full import of the terms employed: and it perfectly accords with many other prophecies of the same times. (Marg. Ref.) (Notes, Ez. xxxix. 23—29. Zech. xii. 6—14.)

V. 16—20. Then will religion and righteousness become permanent both among Jews and Gentiles; in that part of the earth which is yet a wilderness, and in that which is comparatively a fruitful field: and the people of God, trusting in his mercy, and employed in working righteousness, will enjoy much inward peace and outward tranquillity; and have the full assurance and confidence of faith and hope, in a high degree, and continually. They shall also dwell in quiet habitations; whilst the storm of divine vengeance shall destroy their enemies, though numerous as the trees of a forest; (even as the angel smote the army of Sennacherib;) and that city, which was long the seat of antichrist, shall be utterly abased, as Nineveh and Babylon have been. Then the work of ministers, and the endeavours of Christians to do good, shall be happy and successful, as that of those who cultivate a well watered soil, and sow their seed upon it in confidence of an abundant increase. (Notes, xxx. 23—26. Ec. xi. 1—6.) 'This 'exactly answers to the manner of planting rice; for they 'sow it upon the water; and before sowing, while the 'earth is covered with water, they cause the ground to be 'trodden by oxen, horses, and asses, who go mid-leg deep; 'and this is the way of preparing the ground for sowing. (Sir John Chardin, in Bp. Lowth.) It is remarkable that several of the same words are used in these verses, to describe the well-grounded confidence and holy tranquillity of the righteous, which in the former part of the chapter expressed the presumption, gayety, and carnal security of the wicked.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

The character, laws, and administration of Christ, our righteous and merciful King, and their blessed effects on the state of the world, and upon the conduct and happiness of all his subjects, show what kings and princes ought to be, and how they should aim to promote the honour of God and the happiness of mankind, by their use of authority and influence. This, if generally attended to, would conduce to a more general and clear discernment of the principles of religion; good instructions would be more regarded; the careless and profligate would be led "to apply their "hearts unto wisdom;" the works and word of God would be more generally and plainly discoursed upon; characters and actions would be ascertained with greater precision, and vice and folly be disgraced, instead of being flattered and caressed. But, alas! too commonly, vile men push themselves into authority, urged on by restless ambition, and unrestrained by conscientious scruples; and the expectation, or possession, of such dangerous pre-eminence too often corrupts those who were otherwise more respectable. When bad men obtain power, they speak according to the deceit, selfishness, and villany of their hearts; and their wickedness connects with hypocrisy, impiety, or infidelity, as it best suits their purposes. Nor will they ever want counsellors and agents in iniquity or oppression; and thus the poor labourer, the orphan, or the widow, is grievously injured and defrauded, perhaps under colour of law, though in defiance of truth and justice. In the mean time they prepare ruin for themselves; for "He that "is higher than the highest regardeth it," and will call them to a strict account. But disinterested liberal men, who love their poor brethren for the Lord's sake and after his example, who employ their thoughts in devising, and, according to their ability, in executing plans of liberality, shall be established for ever; and by liberal things shall they stand. Such are the genuine disciples and subjects of the Lord Jesus, who reigns in righteousness: and all they who use authority as his deputies, will rule in judgment. But He alone can be our Hiding-place from the wind and Covert from the tempest; he alone can give us to drink of the Fountain of the water of life; he alone can afford us protection and refreshment amongst the unavoidable evils of life, and in the approaching hour of death. To him let the trembling sinner flee for refuge from the wrath to come: to him let the tempted persecuted believer have recourse in every trial: from him let us all seek wisdom, strength, grace, and consolation: keeping close under his shadow, and drinking from his fulness, as we journey forward through this weary land. And as we trace his steps through the desert, let us remember how he suffered himself, that we might have pardon, peace, security, and strong consolation. Let us also be thankful for our abundant means of knowledge and wisdom: and that he hath opened our eyes to behold his glory: and let us still wait on him to enlarge and clear up our views; and to open our ears more entirely to instruction, that our foolish hearts may understand knowledge, and our stammering tongues may be loosed to speak plainly to his praise. We ought also to judge of ourselves and others by the rule of his word, to avoid flattery as well as slander, and not to call evil good and good evil. We should seek to have our hearts more divested of selfishness, that our words may be pure, affectionate, sincere, and pious; that we may avoid injustice, hypocrisy, heresy, hardness of heart, and contempt of God's commandments; and that we may show whose subjects we are, by liberally communicating to the necessities of our brethren, and doing all the good we can in the world.

V. 9—20.

Alas, how many careless ones are there, even among professed Christians, who support excessive self-indulgence by shameful niggardliness! Who spend more on their own vanity and luxury in a day, than many large families have to subsist on through the week or month; and who do not contribute to their relief, in any proportion to their other lavish expenses! We must call upon such thoughtless persons, who are at ease in Zion, to attend to the word of God: we must declare unto them his whole counsel, without respect of rank or sex: we must, without ceremony, show them that misery is before them; except their laughter be turned into godly sorrow, and their carnal joy into humiliation of soul before God, and works meet for repentance. Soon will all their pleasures vanish, and leave them to regret their loss: not only many days and years will they be troubled, but for ever: not only will all the houses of joy, through the most populous and joyous cities, be desolated; but the earth and all its works shall be burnt up. Nay, none can know what may come upon them here, nor how soon all their pleasures may be turned into anguish of spirit. But they are yet in the land of mercy: and when the Spirit from on high is poured out on any soul, or company of people, a glorious change takes place: and the barren wilderness becomes a fruitful field. Let us then carefully note the effects of this blessed influence, in the judgment and righteousness produced by it; let us trust in the righteousness of the Redeemer, and copy his example: thus alone can we possess peace in our souls, and permanent assurance; and thus we shall either conciliate our enemies, or God will protect us, and destroy them. And let us pray for the pouring out of this blessed Spirit upon our children and families, upon all the ministers of Christ and their congregations, upon our whole land, the whole visible church, and the whole earth: for until that be vouchsafed, wars and massacres, tyranny and oppression, rebellions, insurrections, and bloody revolutions, profligacy and licentiousness, profaneness or hypocrisy, and other lamented evils will prevail in the world; nor can any effectual method be adopted of very greatly meliorating the state of men in society, or remedying the mischiefs resulting from human depravity, except as the Gospel is faithfully preached, with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, to render it effectual by his regenerating and new-creating power; as on the day of Pentecost in the conversion of three thousand Jews. In praying for this blessing, we cannot go beyond the extent of the promises and predictions; and when all Christians shall be excited to abound in such fervent supplications, we may be confident that the glorious period approaches. Happy are they who sow the good seed in places well watered with these sacred influences; where a large increase may surely be expected. We, therefore, who are called to labour in the word and doctrine, especially should remember, that success as much depends on the fervency of our prayers, as on the faithfulness of our preaching; and far more than it does on our learning or ingenuity. Let us then pray without ceasing, and we shall find that our labour is not in vain in the Lord.

when thou shalt make an end to deal treacherously, they shall deal treacherously with thee.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1. This chapter forms a distinct prophecy, relating chiefly to the Assyrian invasion. 'And could a translation be made of it, that should come 'up to the original, it would appear to be as noble a 'piece of poetry, as is to be found in the most admired 'writings of the ancients.' (Lowth.) Sennacherib not having received any provocation, and urged on entirely by rapacity and ambition, had plundered the neighbouring nations; and he had treacherously violated his treaty with Hezekiah, after having taken all his treasures as the price of peace. But he would soon be deprived of power to spoil or to deceive; and then his camp would be plundered by the Jews; and he would be most treacherously dealt with by his sons, who would slay him at the temple of his idol. (Marg. Ref.)—'The prophet addresses himself to 'Sennacherib, briefly, but strongly and elegantly, express-'ing the injustice of his ambitious designs, and the sudden 'disappointment of them.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 2. The prophet, for himself and the other believers in Judah, interrupted his predictions, by this expressive ejaculation; intimating that prayer would be the most effectual weapon against the Assyrian invader. He entreated the Lord to be gracious to his people, who expected help from him according to his promise, and that he would continually strengthen those who managed their affairs, and thus saved the nation in the approaching hour of trouble. Or the change of person, (their arm,) may mean, 'the 'arm of all who trust in thee and wait for thee.' (Ps. xxv. 3.)—"Every morning," or speedily, "God shall "help her, and that right early," or 'at the appearing of 'the morning.' (Ps. xlvi. 5. Heb.) This Psalm was composed on account of Judah's deliverance from Sennacherib.

V. 3, 4. The Lord himself seems here to address the Assyrian king. At the rumour of his tumultuous invasion, and his proud and boasting menaces, the nations whom he attacked were put to flight and scattered. But Hezekiah and his subjects would gather all the spoil of his army, as caterpillars strip plants of their verdure; or as locusts, running to and fro, destroy all the produce of the earth. This aptly represents the eagerness of the Jews, each for himself, to seize some part of the spoil left in the deserted camp, till the whole was carried off. (Notes, Joel ii. 20, 21.)

V. 5, 6. Sennacherib exalted himself, and was very prosperous: but the Lord was exalted above him, and above all, upon the lofty throne of his universal kingdom. He had chosen Zion for his earthly residence, and by prospering Hezekiah's attempts for reformation, and raising up many to concur with him, he had filled Jerusalem with judgment and righteousness; so that, compared with other cities, it was a holy city. The wisdom and knowledge which God had conferred on Hezekiah and his princes, were the stability of those perilous times, and tended more to secure the city than the strongest bulwarks: and after Hezekiah had been deprived of his gold and silver, his piety proved a more valuable treasure, and caused him and his people to be enriched with the spoils of the enemy.

V. 7—9. These verses beautifully describe the terror and distress, which preceded the deliverance of Jerusalem from the Assyrians. Their most valiant captains and soldiers, cried out with dismay and deep concern; the ambassadors, that went to solicit peace, wept bitterly at finding the invader inexorable; none ventured to travel. Sennacherib had broken his covenant with Hezekiah, and he despised the feeble opposition made to him by the defenced cities, which he ravaged without mercy, regarding no man; and the most populous and fruitful regions resembled what Lebanon would be, if all its cedars were hewn down and its glory torn from it; and Sharon and Carmel, if made a desert, and their spontaneous productions left to shake without any to gather them.

12 And the people shall be as [f] the burnings of lime: as [g] thorns cut up shall they be burned in the fire.

13 [h] Hear, ye that are far off, what I have done, and [i] ye that are near, acknowledge my might.

14 ¶ The [k] sinners in Zion are afraid; fearfulness hath surprised [l] the hypocrites. [m] Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with [n] everlasting burnings?

15 He [o] that walketh * righteously, and speaketh † uprightly: [p] he that despiseth the gain of ‡ oppressions, [q] that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, [r] that stoppeth his ears from hearing of § blood, and shutteth his eyes from seeing evil.

16 He [s] shall dwell ‖ on high: [t] his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks: [u] bread shall be given him; his water shall be sure.

17 Thine [x] eyes shall see the king in his beauty: they shall behold the land * that is very far off.

18 Thine heart shall meditate terror. [z] Where is the scribe? where is the † receiver? [a] where is he that counted the towers?

19 Thou shalt not [b] see a fierce people, a people of [c] a deeper speech than thou canst perceive; of a ‡ stammering tongue, that thou canst not understand.

20 [d] Look upon Zion, [e] the city of our solemnities: [f] thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; [g] not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.

21 But there [h] the glorious LORD will be unto us [i] a place of § broad rivers and streams; wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby.

22 For [k] the LORD is our Judge, [l] the LORD is our ‖ Lawgiver, [m] the LORD is our King; [n] he will save us.

V. 10—13. In this extremity the Lord declared that he would arise and exalt himself. He would render all the schemes of the invaders abortive; their transient success would only fit them as fuel for the fire, and their own breath, or their blasphemies against him, would kindle the fire, that would burn them as stones are burned to lime, or thorns to ashes. So that the event would be so remarkable, that the nations, far and near, might be called upon to notice it, as an undeniable proof of the almighty power of Israel's God.

V. 14. After all Hezekiah's pious labours, there were many profane and hypocritical persons in Jerusalem who were extremely alarmed with the prospect of impending destruction: and they seem not only to have dreaded the fire, which they supposed would burn their habitations; but those everlasting burnings, which they had heard of as the punishment of the wicked hereafter.—Or rather, the tremendous slaughter of the Assyrians, in answer to the prayers of the king and the prophet, would make those, who had despised the authority of the one and the word of the other, fear similar or even more dreadful vengeance.

V. 15, 16. The prophet seems here to avail himself of the terror of the ungodly Jews, that he might excite them to seek the privileges of the righteous: and he describes the character and the safety of the believer. He habitually acts with integrity, in his whole conduct towards God and his neighbour: his words are sincere, punctual, and faithful: he despiseth the largest gain of fraud or oppression: he shakes from his hands the bribe offered him, to induce his connivance at injustice, and dreads and shuns it as a viper: he stops his ears from every proposal of violence and bloodshed, and closes his eyes from beholding wickedness, as one that detests it. This was the character of Hezekiah in private and public. This placed him and his helpers on high out of the reach of the invaders, and secured them as in natural fastnesses and impregnable strong-holds; and preserved them likewise from the famine that had threatened them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17—19. The pious Jews had grieved to see their king in sackcloth and greatly abased: but they would soon see him in his royal robes, and honoured by God and all the people. They were shut up in Jerusalem; but they would soon be allowed to visit the most remote corners of the land in entire security. And then they would meditate with satisfaction on those events which had so greatly alarmed them. The officers of the Assyrian monarch who mustered the troops, dispensed their provisions, raised contributions, or weighed the gold and silver which they had taken, or made observations on the towers of Jerusalem, would suddenly disappear and be no more: or the secretaries, tax-gatherers, and engineers, (as we say,) of Hezekiah, who had bestowed much pains to provide against a siege, would appear to have been totally useless; as the Lord had not employed them, but an angel, to destroy the Assyrian army. (1 Cor. i. 20.) And they would no longer see their fierce enemies, whose very language, not being understood, had rendered them more formidable and implacable.

V. 20—22. The city which God had chosen for the centre of his worship, and in which the Jews observed all their solemnities, was, it is probable, when this prophecy was delivered, threatened with an immediate siege; but it would soon become a quiet habitation. The Assyrians thought they could as easily take and destroy it, as a man removes a tent: but it would not suffer the least injury. For the glorious JEHOVAH, the acknowledged Judge, Lawgiver, and King of Israel, would be the almighty Protector of his temple and his worshippers; surrounding them by his powerful presence as with large rivers and winding streams, into which no galley, or ship of war, belonging to their enemies should enter. (Note, Ps. xlvi. 4, 5.)—'He shall give Jerusalem protection without danger. In 'other cities and countries, where they have the commo-'dity of large rivers and inlets from the sea, there may be 'some peril of advantage to an enemy; but here shall be 'no such matter.' (Bp. Hall.) The security and privileges of the Gospel-church, especially in those glorious times predicted, seem here principally intended: for Jerusalem was never, after that, long together preserved from hostile invasions, and it has been repeatedly taken down as a tent.

V. 23, 24. The mention of gallant ships led the prophet to consider the ruin of the Assyrian army, as a vessel wrecked in a storm. Their tacklings were all driven away; the mast was blown down, and could not be properly strengthened; their efforts were vain, their ruin unavoidable, and, being cast upon the hostile strand, their cargo became plunder for the inhabitants. On this occasion even the lame would hobble out to appropriate something of the spoil; and no sickness would prevent the people in general from coming to share the booty. In short, God had pardoned the sin of his people, and all blessings were consequent upon it. This last verse leads our thoughts, not only to the most glorious state of the church on earth, but to heaven itself: whither no sickness or trouble shall find admission.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—13.

Unprovoked rapine and treachery are peculiarly hateful to God, who will punish those that are guilty of them with marked severity. When the wicked have filled up the measure of their sins, they frequently are spoiled of their treasures, and cheated to their ruin, by others as vile as themselves. They are in a more perilous case, whose condign punishment is connected with the answer of the prayers of the Lord's people: for he will graciously defend and uphold all those who call upon and wait for him, and will be their Salvation in every time of trouble. And as we have trials and services for every day, we should every morning beg of God to be our Arm and our Strength for them. The scourges of the world cause great consternation by their tumult and prowess; but at length they fall an easy prey to their enemies. For the Lord is exalted above all in heaven and earth: it is his glory to abase the proud, and to take care of Zion; and in proportion as any part of the visible church is replenished by him with truth and holiness, he will delight to watch over it for good. Wisdom, and knowledge, and righteousness, form the stability of our souls, in all persecutions and temptations; and render us steadfast and unmoveable in the ways of God: and true piety is the only treasure which can never be plundered or spent. The same wisdom, justice, and piety, establish the honour and safety of nations; and render the throne of princes in a measure like that of the Lord; yet even his servants are liable to many fears and distresses; especially when they lean to carnal dependences, or cleave to earthly objects. To wean them from these, and to chastise them for their folly, ungodly men are permitted to prosper, and to menace them with dreadful calamities. Then the very champions of the church, and her ambassadors of peace, are apt to be dejected and alarmed; as they see the high ways of Zion unfrequented, and all around ready to faint, by reason of the insults of persecutors and infidels, who have no regard to either God or man. But when all other confidence fails the believer, and when the enemies of the church think their victory secure, the Lord will arise, and in some unthought-of manner, turn the devices of the wicked into confusion, and consume them with the fire of his indignation; that all men may hear, acknowledge his might, and fear before him.

V. 14—24.

The sinners and hypocrites in Zion have cause to expect more tremendous vengeance than even avowed enemies: and what fearfulness will surprise them, when they shall at length appear before the tribunal of God! when the Judge shall frown, and denounce sentence against them, and the pit of hell shall open wide to receive them! It behooves all therefore to inquire seriously, Who they are that shall dwell with everlasting burnings? And whether we have that genuine godliness, which proves that Jesus hath delivered us from the wrath to come? For it is not a tolerable evil to which sinners are exposed, but the everlasting wrath of almighty God: and many, in congregations which are favoured with the best means of grace, will, to their own amazement, sink from under them into these everlasting burnings. "Oh, that men were wise, "that they would know these things, and consider their "latter end!" For there is a Refuge provided: sinners of all kinds are called upon to flee to it, none refused admission; and every blessing of salvation is freely bestowed on all who ask in humble believing prayer. Yet unless men show that they have received the atonement, by a life of piety, integrity, sincerity, and superiority to the love of filthy lucre, they must be considered as hypocrites in Zion. The believer is placed in an honourable and secure station; he is safe in time, and for eternity; and whoever wants, "bread shall be given him, his water shall be sure." He now by faith beholds the King in his glory and beauty, and anticipates the joys of heaven: and ere long his faith shall be changed for vision, his hope for full fruition. He can contemplate with gratitude those awful subjects, which fill the ungodly with terror and dismay: he needs not fear any of his crafty and subtle enemies, whom he shall shortly see no more for ever. Our holy city, the Church, in which the ordinances of God are administered, though often assaulted by fierce and barbarous foes, will become at length a quiet habitation; and will no longer be exposed to the insults, revilings, or menaces of proud oppressors. And though her humble appearance be despised by them, yet not one of her stakes shall ever be removed, nor any of her cords broken, by all the united efforts of earth and hell. But the Lord himself will be her glory, beauty, riches, and happiness: and every one who submits to him as King, obeys him as a Lawgiver, and waits for him as a Judge, will surely partake of his complete salvation. For Immanuel reigns over all his redeemed people, and as they are become his willing subjects, so he is their sure Protector; while all that refuse to have him to reign over them, will make shipwreck of their souls. The poorest and feeblest believer will reap immense advantage from the disappointed devices of his enemies. He that blotteth out our transgressions, will heal our souls, and bring us to that land, whose blessed inhabitants shall no more complain of sickness, pain, or sorrow for ever. Let us then patiently endure our transient afflictions, and "both hope and quietly "wait the salvation of God."

NOTES.

CHAP XXXIV. V. 1. This chapter and the next form one prophecy; and the whole of this is most tremendously descriptive of the greatest carnage and desolation, that can be conceived or expressed. Some interpreters suppose it to be a general and poetical declaration of God's vengeance upon sinners, at the day of judgment and in the eternal world: and, as is frequently the case, there are some images applicable to those events. But the connexion between these tremendous scenes and the flourishing state of religion next predicted, as well as many things in the prophecy itself, determines us to another interpretation. —The solemn and repeated call to all nations, and to the earth and every thing in it, to attend, shows that events of great importance to all the world are predicted.

V. 2. All nations. That is, all nations and their armies, considered as enlisted under the standard of Satan to war against the church of God. (Marg. Ref.) 'This 'may fitly be applied to "the battle of the great day of "the Almighty." (Rev. xvi. 14—16.) (Lowth.) 'God 'hath determined in his counsel, and hath given sentence 'for their destruction.'

V. 3—7. (Notes, Ez. xxxix. Rev. xix.) The description of vast multitudes slain, and left unburied till they become intolerably offensive; and of human blood shed in such prodigious quantities, as to authorize the strong hyperboles of the mountains being melted, and the land soaked with it, whilst the dust of the earth is fattened with the fat and flesh of men, suggests most tremendous ideas of these divine judgments: and it impresses the mind with a view of that general and obstinate resistance which will be made by the nations, at the instigation of Satan, to the setting up of the kingdom of Christ; and of the dreadful judgments with which that event will at length be ushered in. The dissolving of the hosts of heaven, represents the surprising revolutions, which will every where take place, in the constitution of kingdoms and states. (Rev. vi. 13.) The Lord's "sword bathed in heaven," may allude to some method then in use of burnishing or tempering armour; and it implies, that the vengeance would be executed according to the wise and righteous purposes of God,

8 For it is [q] the day of the LORD's vengeance, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion.

9 And [r] the streams thereof shall be turned into pitch, and the dust thereof into brimstone, and the land thereof shall become burning pitch.

10 It [s] shall not be quenched night nor day; [t] the smoke thereof shall go up for ever: [u] from generation to generation it shall lie waste; none shall pass through it for ever and ever.

11 But [x] the * cormorant and the bittern shall possess it; the owl also and the raven shall dwell in it; and he shall [y] stretch out upon it the line of confusion, and the stones of emptiness.

12 They shall [z] call the nobles thereof to the kingdom, but none shall be there, and all her princes shall be [a] nothing.

13 And [b] thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles and brambles in the fortresses thereof; and it shall be [c] an habitation of dragons, and a court for † owls.

14‡ The wild beasts of the desert shall also meet with § the wild beasts of the island, and the satyr shall cry to his fellow: the ‖ screech-owl also shall rest there, and find for herself a place of rest.

15 There shall the great owl make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shadow: there shall the vultures also be gathered, every one with her mate.

16 ¶ [d] Seek ye out of the book of the LORD, and read: no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate: for [e] my mouth it hath commanded, and his Spirit it hath gathered them.

17 And [f] he hath cast the lot for them, and his hand hath divided it unto them by line; [g] they shall possess it for ever, from generation to generation shall they dwell therein.

and with invincible power. Idumea, or the land of Edom, was a rival of the Jews: the prediction might have a partial accomplishment in the desolations occasioned by the Assyrians, Chaldeans, Macedonians, and Romans, in which that district was involved. But those events had no connexion with that glorious spread of religion next predicted; nor doth it appear that they were answerable to such a tremendous description. Idumea may therefore be taken as a general name, denoting the nations inimical to the church, as the Edomites were to the Jews: and for the kingdom of Antichrist. As "the people of his curse," (peculiarly deserving his wrath and exposed to it,) the Lord had devoted them to utter destruction; and would make them a sacrifice at Bozrah, the chief city of Idumea; (Notes, lxiii. 1—6;) that is, at the chief residence of Antichrist. The sword of divine justice will then be satisfied with the fatness and blood of the enemies to God; as when lambs, rams, and goats were slain, and their fat was burnt upon the altar. And not only inferior enemies, but unicorns, bullocks, and bulls will thus be sacrificed in abundance; that is, the proudest and mightiest princes of the world will there be destroyed by the justice and power of God. 'It seems 'reasonable to suppose, with many learned expositors, 'that this prophecy has a further view to events still future; 'to some great revolutions to be effected in the latter times, 'antecedent to that more perfect state of the kingdom of 'God on earth, and serving to introduce it, which the holy 'scripture warrants us to expect.' (Bp. Lowth.) 'Edom 'signifies red, as blood is; and Bozrah, a vintage, which 'in the prophetical idiom denotes God's vengeance upon 'the wicked. (lxiii. 3. Joel iii. 13. Rev. xiv. 19, 20. 'xix. 13.) The Jewish writers do generally suppose that 'Edom in the writings of the prophets, stands for Rome.' (Lowth.)

V. 8. The church has long been oppressed and wasted, by the nations of the earth: but the period approaches, when the controversy betwixt her and her adversaries will be decided; and the Lord will in vengeance recompense them for their injustice and cruelty to his people. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—15. These verses relate to the city where this sacrifice was to be made, or at least begun. The language is more emphatical than what had been used respecting Babylon, another type of antichristian Rome. (Notes, xiii. 19—22. xiv. 23.) And the metaphors are taken from Sodom and Gomorrah, if indeed they be metaphors; but probably they will be literally fulfilled, and Sodom will appear to have been another emblem of that devoted city. (Marg. Ref.) Perhaps subterraneous fire will consume the seat of antichrist; (and plentiful provision is evidently made in that part of the world, for such an event:) and a continual burning and smoke in several places, may perhaps mark out the place on which that city stood, to all future ages; whilst all the rest of the neighbourhood may be entirely desolated, without any inhabitant, or any passage for travellers through it. For the Lord will measure it with the line of confusion and the plummet of emptiness: (the words rendered "without form and void," Gen. i. 2:) and that city, whose nobles, or princes, civil or ecclesiastical, have so long lorded it over other nations, shall no more have any one to exercise authority. All her tyranny and magnificence shall come to nothing; whilst weeds, thorns, savage beasts, doleful and ravenous birds, and venomous reptiles, shall inhabit the spot where her proud towers and palaces have stood; and there meet with no disturbance. (Notes, Rev. xviii. 2. 20—24. xix. 3.)

V. 16, 17. Men in every age are here called on to examine the prophecies, which relate to these and similar events: assured that they will be exactly fulfilled. The Lord will take care that all the animals above-mentioned shall propagate uninterruptedly, in the place intended. The same Spirit that inspired the prediction will take care of its accomplishment: and the region God himself has allotted them shall be their solitary residence to the end of time.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All nations and people are concerned to draw near and attend to the word of God; as all must be judged according to it. Because of men's wickedness the indignation of the Lord hath been on all nations from the beginning: and the history of mankind is little more than an account how God hath given them up to be slaughtered by each other, till the earth has become a field of blood. In these awful events he executes his own righteous, wise, and deep decrees: and all, who perish by the sword of his anger, are sacrifices to his justice, and he is glorified in their punishment.—In the great vicarious sacrifice of his beloved Son, his justice is fully satisfied, and through him, he delighteth and is glorified, in showing mercy. But "how will they "escape who neglect so great salvation?" The day of the Lord's vengeance, and the year of the recompenses of Zion will come shortly: and imagination cannot reach the horrors of that awful season, to those who shall be found opposing the church of Christ. And if temporal judgments may be rendered so tremendous; what will be the general conflagration, the day of judgment, and the unquenchable fire of hell? There, all the ungodly must for ever be expiating, yet never expiate, the guilt of their sins! But let us daily seek out of the book of the Lord and read; and compare all that we there discover with the conduct of providence around us; that we may be more fully convinced of these important truths, and be rendered more diligent in seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness. What the mouth of the Lord hath commanded, his Spirit and providence will perform; and he will allot every man his portion among those with whom he is qualified to associate, and in that place which is congenial to his disposition; and they shall all possess their portion for ever.—Let us observe how the evidence of our holy religion is continually accumulating, as one prophecy after another is accomplished: until the full completion of these awful scenes will introduce more happy days; for which we should hope without fainting, and pray without ceasing.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1, 2. This chapter may have some allusion to the prosperity of Judah, in the days of Hezekiah, at the time when Idumea was ravaged; or to the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity: but without doubt the kingdom of Christ was the grand subject intended by the Holy Spirit.—When the Gospel was embraced by the Gentiles, and vast multitudes of spiritual and holy worshippers of God were raised up among them; "the wilderness and solitary place rejoiced, and blos-"somed as the rose." Yet a vast proportion of the earth is still a desert; and neither means of grace, nor spiritual worshippers, nor fruits of holiness, are to be found in it. But when the events predicted in the foregoing chapter shall take place, all these countries shall rejoice because of them. The destruction of the antichristian powers will make way for the most rapid and extensive success of the Gospel: the poor benighted Jews will be converted, and the Gentile world will then blossom abundantly in every part of it, and be filled with joy and grateful praise to God our Saviour. The glory and excellency of the most favoured and fruitful spots, through all preceding ages, shall be conferred on all the dark and barren regions of the earth: as if the productions of Lebanon, Sharon, and Carmel, were transplanted into the parched desert, and made to flourish there. For they shall behold the glory and excellency of the Lord our God in the face of Jesus Christ, and shall learn to fear, love, trust, worship, obey, and imitate him, in righteousness, goodness, and truth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The prophet directs the strong in faith, and especially teachers, to encourage their weaker brethren, through successive generations, with the prospect of this happy event to all the troubles of the church; that they may not despond on account of what they witness or suffer. By these animated topics the hands of the weak must be strengthened for the work, the feeble knees confirmed to run the race, and the fearful hearts fortified for the conflict. For though the Lord permit his enemies to prevail for a time: yet he will come to execute vengeance on them according to their deservings, and to save his afflicted people. (Marg. Ref.) This might be applied to the first coming of Christ to destroy the works of the devil; to his coming in his providence to destroy the unbelieving Jews and establish his kingdom; from age to age to rescue his persecuted servants; and to his final coming to judge the world: but it seems immediately to predict the event which was the subject of the foregoing chapter. (Note, xxxiv. 8.) 'This may be applied to Christ, who is God 'as well as man.' (Lowth.)

V. 5—7. 'The miraculous works wrought by our 'blessed Saviour are so clearly specified, that we cannot 'avoid making the application: and our Saviour himself 'has plainly referred to this passage. (Matt. xi. 4, 5.) '—Where are these works so distinctly marked by any of 'the prophets, as in this place? And how could they be 'marked more distinctly? To these the strictly literal in-'terpretation of the prophet's words directs us: according 'to the allegorical interpretation they may have a further 'view.' (Bp. Lowth.)—The miracles of our Lord, here literally predicted, were also emblems of the effect produced by the power of his grace upon the souls of men; when the eyes of the mind are enlightened, the ears that were closed by prejudices are opened to instruction, the helpless sinner is invigorated to walk with joy in the ways of God, and his lips sing and speak praises to his name. The superior knowledge, holiness, and comfort, enjoyed under the Gospel-dispensation, and the more abundant conversion of sinners that then took place, are here predicted. 'This part of the prophecy may run parallel with the 'former, and relate to the conversion of the Jews, and 'their restitution to their own land; to the extension 'and purification of the Christian faith.' (Bp. Lowth.) The calling of the Gentiles was meant by the waters and streams breaking forth in the desert; when that dry and parched soil was converted into a well-watered country; and the abode of Satan and his worshippers became productive of the pleasant and valuable fruits of righteousness. But when these blessings shall overspread the earth, the accomplishment will be unspeakably more remarkable.—The word rendered parched ground, signifies glowing sand, both in Hebrew and Arabic.—'The glowing sandy 'plain,—in the hot countries, has the appearance of wa-'ter.'—As to the unbelievers, their works are like a vapour 'in a plain, which the thirsty traveller thinketh to be wa-'ter, until, when he cometh thereto, he findeth it to be no-'thing.' (Koran, Bp. Lowth.)

V. 8—10. The knowledge of the truth and will of God, when made very plain and clear to any people, is like casting up an highway through a country that was before impassable. The Gentile world was a desert, in this as well as other respects; no highway to God and heaven was to be there met with. This advantage began to be vouchsafed, when the Gospel was sent to the nations: yet an immense proportion of the earth is still destitute of it. But it may be said of China, Japan, the interior regions of Africa, and every other part of the earth, where Christ hath scarcely been named, that "an highway shall "be there." Christ shall be clearly made known; and the way of duty shall be plainly marked out. This authorized way shall be called "the way of holiness," as it leads to a holy God and a holy heaven, and no unclean or unconverted sinner, passes over it: but it is appropriated to those, before-mentioned, who have experienced the power of the Saviour's grace. These are way-faring men, who really desire to walk in this way: and though they may be men of weak capacities, unlearned, and apt to mistake, they shall be preserved from missing the road. No tempter or persecutor can injure those who walk in it; and at the period chiefly predicted, the great enemy of souls shall be chained up, and the persecutors of the church be cut off: so that none of them shall be found there, even to affright the pilgrims. Then sinners, ransomed by the blood, and rescued by the power, of their Redeemer the Lord of Hosts, shall return, join themselves to the Lord in his holy ordinances, and go on their way abounding in joy and praise; till they arrive at the heavenly Zion, and have for ever done with sorrow and sighing, and be crowned with everlasting joy and felicity.

Ghost sent down from heaven, are of all others the most valuable, and conduce the most to our unmingled consolation: whilst blossoms of heavenly fragrancy are produced in this desert land, may our souls blossom and bring forth fruit abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing! may the peculiar excellency and glory of believers in every age be communicated to us, by the transforming knowledge of the glory and excellency of our God and Saviour! Hitherto many real Christians have been weak in faith, and ready to faint amidst their many trials and enemies. But we should take courage in the midst of our tribulations; that the joy of the Lord may give strength to our souls, in our work, race, and warfare. They that trust in the Lord's mercy, and desire to walk in his ways, ought not to be of a fearful heart; for he will not cast them off, or suffer their enemies to prevail against them: they should therefore be strong, and not fear. Let the enemies of God and his church have terror for their portion, but let his servants rejoice: for the Lord will shortly come to execute vengeance on the one, and to complete the other's salvation. That power that once opened the eyes of the blind, and unstopped the deaf ears, is sufficient to illuminate the humble, and sanctify the most benighted, stout, and polluted sinner: to make the feeble believer victorious, and to comfort the most dejected. Let us then apply to him thus to renew and rejoice our hearts: and let us supplicate him in behalf of our blinded, hardened, and enslaved relatives and neighbours, and for a world that lieth in wickedness. May the Lord make bare his holy arm, as when the apostles preached his Gospel: that all the desert lands may be replenished with wells of salvation and with fruits of righteousness, and favoured with highways to God and holiness! As this way of holiness is cast up in our land, may we walk in it, and thus approve ourselves to be the redeemed of the Lord. But no unholy person can find this way, however ingenious, learned, or wise he may be in this world. It is only found by wayfaring men, who leave the paths of vice and folly, to pursue eternal life and happiness; who seek direction from the word and Spirit of God, and walk by faith in Christ in the paths of holy obedience. These, though esteemed fools by the world, and though they often are of very slender talents, shall be found wise unto eternal salvation. We do not indeed live in those favoured days, when no lion or ravenous beast shall be found in the believer's path; yet even at present every lion is chained, and every traveller divinely protected. Let us then go forward with alacrity, and rejoice in praising our gracious Lord: we shall soon arrive at the heavenly Zion; all our sorrows will flee away, and our everlasting joy and triumph be perfected: for he, who will render his church on earth victorious over every persecutor, will make each believer more than conqueror over every foe, till death be swallowed up in victory.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVI. V. 1. As many of Isaiah's predictions related to the events here recorded: it was proper that the history should be inserted; but as it hath before been fully considered, it will not be necessary to add more than a few hints in this place. (Notes, &c. 2 Kings xviii. xix.)—'We may probably conjecture, that this was part 'of that history of Hezekiah's reign which Isaiah wrote, 'as we read 2 Chr. xxxii. 32.' (Lowth.)

V. 2. Three verses, found in Kings, are here omitted. Hezekiah submitted, and gave Sennacherib all his treasures as the price of peace: but soon after, probably the next year, Sennacherib sent Rabshakeh, as here recorded.—(Notes, 2 Kings xviii. 14—18. xx. 1.) It is also added in the parallel passage, that Rabshakeh and his companions "called to the king," or demanded an audience of him.

V. 3. Shebna. 'This declareth, that there were but 'few godly to be found in the king's house, when he was 'driven to send this wicked man in so weighty a matter.' (Notes, xxii. 15—25.)

in the LORD our God: [m] is it not he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away, and said to Judah and to Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar?

8 Now therefore give * pledges, I pray thee, to my master the king of Assyria, [n] and I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.

9 How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of [o] the least of my master's servants, [p] and put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and for horsemen?

10 And [q] am I now come up without the LORD against this land to destroy it? The LORD said unto me, Go up against this land, and destroy it.

11 Then said Eliakim and Shebna and Joah unto Rabshakeh, Speak, I pray thee, unto thy servants [r] in the Syrian language; for we understand it: and speak not to us in the Jews' language, in the ears of the people that are on the wall.

12 But Rabshakeh said, Hath my master sent me to thy master and to thee to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit upon the wall, [s] that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you?

13 Then Rabshakeh stood, and [t] cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and said, [u] Hear ye the words of the great king, the king of Assyria.

14 Thus saith the king, [x] Let not Hezekiah deceive you: for he shall not be able to deliver you.

15 Neither let Hezekiah [y] make you trust in the LORD, saying, The LORD will surely deliver us: this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.

16 Hearken not to Hezekiah: for thus saith the king of Assyria, † Make an agreement with me by a present, and [a] come out to me: and [b] eat ye every one of his vine, and every one of his fig-tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern;

17 Until [c] I come and take you away to a land like your own land, [d] a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards.

18 Beware [e] lest Hezekiah persuade you, saying, The LORD will deliver us. [f] Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?

19 Where are the gods of [g] Hamath and [h] Arphad? where are the gods of [i] Sepharvaim? [k] and have they delivered Samaria out of my hand?

20 Who are they among all the gods of these lands, that have delivered their land out of my hand, [l] that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?

21 But [m] they held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not.

22 Then came [n] Eliakim, the son of Hilkiah, that was over the household, and Shebna, the scribe, and Joah, the son of Asaph, the recorder, to Hezekiah [o] with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rabshakeh.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Infidels in every age deride the dependence placed by believers on an invisible protection; but their own self-confidence will terminate in shame; when the hope that rests on the word of God shall be found to praise and honour and glory. The afflicted servant of God will generally find it best to leave ungodly men to revile, boast, insult, and menace, without making any reply: for humiliation, faith, and prayer are our proper employment, in seasons of personal or public distress. And, however men attempt to discourage or exasperate us, they will not do us any real harm; unless they can prevail with us to neglect the commandments of our Lord and Master.

CHAP. XXXVII. V. 3. (Notes, 2 Kings xix.) 'We are in as great sorrow, as a woman that travaileth of 'child, and cannot be delivered.'

V. 12. 'Eden, where Paradise was situated, was in 'Mesopotamia, as learned men are generally agreed:— 'and in this text,—and Ez. xxvii. 23,—it is joined with 'Haran, a noted city in Mesopotamia.' (Lowth.) save us from his hand, [s] that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the LORD, even [t] thou only.

21 ¶ Then Isaiah the son of Amoz sent unto Hezekiah, saying: Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, [u] Whereas thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of Assyria:

22 This is the word which the LORD hath spoken concerning him; [x] The virgin, [y] the daughter of Sion [z] hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn; the daughter of Jerusalem hath [a] shaken her head at thee.

23 [b] Whom hast thou reproached and blasphemed; and [c] against whom hast thou exalted thy voice, and lifted up thine eyes on high? even against [d] the Holy One of Israel.

24 By * thy [e] servants hast thou reproached the LORD, and hast said, [f] By the multitude of my chariots am I come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon: and I will cut down the † tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir-trees thereof: and I will enter into the height of his border, and the forest ‡ of his Carmel.

25 I have digged, and drunk water; and [g] with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of the § besieged places.

26 Hast thou not heard ‖ long ago, [h] how I have done it; and of ancient times, that I have formed it? now have I brought it to pass, that thou shouldest be to lay waste defenced cities into ruinous heaps.

27 Therefore [i] their inhabitants were * of small power, they were dismayed and confounded; they were [k] as the grass of the field, and as the green herb, as the grass on the house-tops, and as corn blasted before it be grown up.

28 But [l] I know thy † abode, and thy going out, and thy coming in, and thy rage against me.

29 Because [m] thy rage against me, and [n] thy tumult, is come up into mine ears; therefore [o] will I put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way by which thou camest.

30 And [p] this shall be a sign unto thee, [q] Ye shall eat this year such as groweth of itself; and the second year that which springeth of the same: and in the third year sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.

31 And the ‡ remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah shall again [r] take root downward, and bear fruit upward:

32 For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and § they that escape out of mount Zion: [s] the zeal of the LORD of hosts shall do this.

33 Therefore thus saith the LORD concerning the king of Assyria, [t] He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with ‖ shields, nor [u] cast a bank against it.

34 By [x] the way that he came, by the same shall he return, and shall not come into this city, saith the LORD.

35 For [y] I will defend this city, to save it [z] for mine own sake, [a] and for my servant David's sake.

36 ¶ Then [b] the angel of the LORD went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and fourscore and five thousand: [c] and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses.

37 So [d] Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at [e] Nineveh.

38 And it came to pass, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch [f] his god, that Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword; and they escaped into the land of * Armenia: and [g] Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Hezekiah, being sick unto death, prays; and has his life prolonged, with a promise of deliverance from the Assyrians, 1—6. The sun goeth back ten degrees, as a sign to him, 7, 8. His recollection of his thoughts and prayer when sick, and thanksgivings for recovery, 9—20. The means appointed for that end, 21, 22.

IN those days [a] was Hezekiah sick unto death. [b] And Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz came unto him, and said unto him, Thus saith the LORD, * Set thine house in order: [c] for thou shalt die, and not live.

2 Then Hezekiah [d] turned his face toward the wall, and prayed unto the LORD,

3 And said, [e] Remember now, O LORD, I beseech thee, how [f] I have walked before thee in truth and with [g] a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight. And Hezekiah [h] wept † sore.

4 Then came the word of the LORD to Isaiah, saying,

5 Go, [i] and say to Hezekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the [k] God of David thy father, [l] I have heard thy prayer, [m] I have seen thy tears: behold, [n] I will add unto thy days fifteen years.

6 And [o] I will deliver thee and this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria: and I will defend this city.

7 And [p] this shall be a sign unto thee from the LORD, that the LORD will do this thing that he hath spoken:

8 Behold, [q] I will bring again the shadow of the degrees, which is gone down in the ‡ sun-dial of Ahaz ten degrees backward. So the sun returned ten degrees, by which degrees it was gone down.

9 ¶ The [r] writing of Hezekiah king of Judah, when [s] he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness:

10 I said, [t] In the cutting off of my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave: I am deprived of the residue of my years.

11 I said, [u] I shall not see the LORD, even the LORD, in the land of the living: I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world.

12 Mine age is departed, and [x] is removed from me [y] as a shepherd's tent: I [z] have cut off like a weaver my life: [a] he will cut me off § with pining sickness: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

13 I reckoned till morning, that [b] as a lion so will he break all my bones: from day even to night wilt thou make an end of me.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our tempters and persecutors effectually subserve our interests, when their endeavours to terrify us or seduce us from God, make us more simple in our dependence, and fervent in our prayers: and when they revile us for the Lord's sake, they engage him on our side, and ensure our victory. Those exploits in which powerful and wicked men glory, form a counterpart of the conduct of the devil, their father: and when their course is run, some unexpected event sends them to their own place. But the Lord will defend his church, for his own sake, and that of his anointed King: and all, who fix their hopes and love on him, shall witness the destruction of all their enemies, and triumph in the full answer of their largest prayers.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1. (Notes, 2 Kings xx. 1—8.)

V. 3. 'One reason of his great concern is supposed 'to be, because he should leave his kingdom in great dis-'traction, under the terrors of a foreign invasion; and 'without any heir to take the government upon him: for 'Manasseh was not born till three years after this.' (Lowth.)

V. 6. 'Hence it appears, that Hezekiah's sickness was 'before the destruction of Sennacherib's army, though it 'be not mentioned till afterward.' (Lowth.) Certainly this language does not well accord to a remote danger; which a new attack from the Assyrians after the destruction of their army must have been.

V. 8. It is here expressly said, that the sun returned, and not merely that the shadow went backward. (Note, Josh. x. 12—14.)

V. 9—13. Hezekiah recorded his thoughts during his sickness, both as condemning himself for his despondency, and as magnifying the power of God in his unexpected recovery. By the premature cutting off of his days before he was forty years old, he was, as he supposed, about to go down to the gates of the grave, and to be deprived of the residue of those years in which he had hoped to be very useful to his people. In his attendance on the worship of the Lord at the temple, he had enjoyed many discoveries of his glory and much experience of his love, which he supposed would now be terminated; and that he was to be excluded from beholding men any more, with the inhabitants of this world. He observed, that his remaining years of life were departed, as a shepherd's tent is removed: His work was finished as a weaver's web, when it is cut 14 Like [c] a crane or a swallow, so did I chatter: [d] I did mourn as a dove: [e] mine eyes fail with looking upward: O LORD, [f] I am oppressed; * undertake for me.

15 [g] What shall I say? he hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it: [h] I shall go softly all my years [i] in the bitterness of my soul.

16 O LORD, [k] by these things men live, and in all these things is the life of my spirit; so wilt thou recover me, and make me to live.

17 Behold, † for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast‡ in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption: for [l] thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back.

18 For [m] the grave cannot praise thee; death can not celebrate thee: [n] they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth.

19 The living, [o] the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day; [p] the father to the children shall make known thy truth.

20 The LORD was ready to save me: [q] therefore we will sing my songs [r] to the stringed instruments, all the days of our life, in the house of the LORD.

21 ¶ For [s] Isaiah had said, Let them take a lump of figs, and lay it for a plaister upon the boil, and he shall recover.

22 Hezekiah also had said, [t] What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the LORD?

out of the loom; for the Lord would finish his web of life in the course of a day; that is, he would make it very short: and by pining sickness, he would soon make an end of him. So that in the evening he reckoned, that by morning at the furthest, the Lord would terminate his days, as a lion crushes the bones of his prey.

V. 14, 15. Hezekiah's disease seems to have been very painful; and perhaps his mind also was discomposed by temptation; so that on recollection, he was conscious he had wanted firmness and patience; his prayers had been mixed with fretfulness or despondency; and his complainings had been unmeaning, like the chattering of a crane or swallow, and excessive, like the mourning of the dove for his mate. And whilst he looked to the Lord for relief, and it did not come, his eyes were weary, and his faith ready to fail. But whilst he was thus bowed down with trouble, and like a debtor that is about to be cast into prison; he still looked to the Lord to be his Surety, and to undertake for him that he might be set at liberty: but at this crisis, he was assured by the prophet that he should recover, and the gracious promise was soon accomplished. He therefore wanted words to express his gratitude for so unexpected and welcome a deliverance; and he hoped that he should walk humbly and circumspectly during the rest of his life, recollecting the bitterness of soul from which he had been rescued. "I will, so long as I live, remember "the bitterness of my soul." 'The remembrance of the 'misery I endured, shall continually excite me to renew 'my thankfulness.' (Lowth.)

V. 16. 'As all men's lives are thy gift, so I shall 'always acknowledge the preservation of mine to be owing 'to thy goodness in promising, and faithfulness in making 'good thy promise.' (Lowth.) By these the souls of men also are saved; and Hezekiah seems to have meant, that he trusted in the promises and faithfulness of God, for the eternal life of his soul, as well as the continuance of his temporal life.

V. 17—20. Hezekiah had enjoyed much peace, but it was at once turned into extreme bitterness. Yet the Lord out of love to him had spared his life, and delivered his body from the pit of corruption; nay, had cast his sins behind his back, being determined not to punish him for them. For death and the grave terminate man's opportunities of praising God on earth, and of dependence on his promises. But the living might thus glorify him, and both spread the knowledge of his truth and will among contemporaries, and also hand it down to posterity. 'Thy wonderful mercy towards me shall be recorded to after ages; 'and fathers shall mention it to their children, as an instance of thy faithfulness.' (Lowth.) Hezekiah purposed without delay to celebrate publicly the praises of the Lord, who had thus shown his readiness to hear his prayers, and save him from death: and to continue so to do as long as he lived. Perhaps this hymn was constantly sung in the house of the Lord, during the remainder of Hezekiah's life.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Afflictions, and intimations of approaching death, should excite us to serious self-examination and fervent prayer, and remind us to settle all our concerns: and, as the testimony of our conscience to the simplicity of our faith and obedience, must form one chief support in a dying hour; we should endeavour so to live, that death may not surprise us when this evidence is dubious. Whatever may be inferred from second causes, we shall surely live till our measure of services is accomplished: but it is just cause of regret and humiliation, when sloth or imprudence has induced us to neglect what we might otherwise have performed. It is good for us to recollect, and in some cases to record, the circumstances, which relate to the frame of our minds under heavy calamities. The review will supply cause for humiliation and gratitude: we shall commonly find, that our faith, hope, and submission, were greatly alloyed with distrust, dejection, and impatience. Sometimes we inordinately desired life, at others we were sinfully reluctant to live: and when the Lord hath corrected us for our good, we have been tempted to conclude that he meant to destroy us. But if indeed our lives should be prematurely cut off, and we deprived of the residue of our years, and no longer allowed to meet the Lord and his saints in his earthly sanctuary: yet, if we be Christians, we shall remove to a more glorious assembly, behold his glory more fully, and praise him in more exalted strains; even when our bodies go down to the gates of the grave. We should always remember, that we now dwell in an earthly tabernacle, that must shortly be taken down: and instead of being anxious to provide for or indulge it, we should be seeking a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. Let us then daily endeavour to exercise repentance, faith, love, and good works: and then, whether the Lord cut us off by pining sickness, or crush us by sudden death, we shall have no cause to complain or to mourn. —In tedious suffering our hearts may be ready to fail us, when expecting help from the Lord; and our immense debt, as well as our potent enemies, may alarm us; but our Surety hath undertaken for us; and as he paid our ransom, he will rescue our souls from the pit of destruction, and cast all our sins behind his back, and into the depths of the sea. Let us believe his promises, and wait upon him to make them good: let us walk watchfully through our remaining years, remembering the bitter convictions and corrections which sin hath occasioned, and the gracious deliverances that the Lord hath vouchsafed us. Thus the grace, truth, and power of our God will be the life of our souls: after a few more interchanges of peace and bitterness, our sorrows will terminate, and our consolations will be perfected. But as we cannot praise God in the grave, let us embrace the present season of serving him among our fellow-sinners; hoping in his word, extolling his perfections, blessing him for his mercies, and obeying his precepts. Let us endeavour to make known his righteousness and salvation to all around us, and to those who are to follow us: bringing our children with us to the house of our God, and instructing them from his word; discoursing with them on all his wondrous works, showing them how ready he is to save and bless those that call upon him, and leading them to walk with us before him, in all his ordinances and commandments; that when we are removed, they may be capable of filling up our places to greater advantage, and may hand down to their children and to posterity those truths and instructions which they have received from us.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Even eminent believers are apt to forget the mercies of God, and to be proud when they ought to be thankful: and they sometimes value too highly the friendly notice of ungodly men, in exalted stations. But such coalitions with the world ensure painful consequences; and the Lord will rebuke, and correct, those whom he loves. Their submission, however, to distressing appointments, shows that grace has regained the ascendency; and truth and peace shall yet be with them through time and to eternity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XL. V. 1, 2. We now enter upon the latter part of this prophecy; in which the name of the prophet is not mentioned: but it proceeds as in one continued discourse, is full of consolatory topics, and treats almost entirely and most clearly of Christ and evangelical subjects. The whole seems to have been written after the deliverance of the Jews from the Assyrian invasion, and towards the close of the prophet's life: and the style and imagery are elegant, rich, and often most sublime: so that it cannot be read without great delight, by one that relishes such beauties; even should he be ignorant of the spiritual and prophetic meaning of the sacred writer. The narration in the preceding chapter, (which perhaps was here inserted, as introductory to these predictions,) had mentioned the Babylonish captivity in express terms: and the prophet was here employed to prepare comfort for the Church in expectation of that affliction, and when groaning under it. But though some reference is made in many places to the return of the Jews from Babylon: yet the prophet is so carried above all temporal deliverances, in the foresight of the great redemption of Christ; that it would often be absurd and vain to seek for any allusion to inferior events, in the language employed by him. The command here given to the prophets and teachers of the Church, (the Septuagint inserts the word priests,) to comfort the people of God and Jerusalem, with the assurance of the termination of their conflicts in victory and triumph, and of the pardon of their sins, may be considered as an introduction to the whole remaining prophecy, which extends to the consummation of all things. The sufferings of the Jewish nation had abundantly vindicated the honour of the law and justice of God, seeing he thus punished his chosen people for their sins: and the sacrifice of Christ displayed the honour of his holiness and righteous government far more, than even the final condemnation of every transgressor could have done. As the Jewish church was to be comforted with the assurance of the Messiah's coming; so are Christians to be encouraged with the assurance of the final victory of his cause on earth; and of the Church militant, and every member of it, soon becoming triumphant in heaven. 'Any state of hardship, is compared to a warfare in 'Scripture.' (2 Tim. ii. 4.) 'The word is applied to 'the attendance of the Levites, in the service of the sanc-'tuary, (Num. viii. 24.) The phrase here alludes to the 'discharge given to soldiers, after many years service.' (Job vii. 1.) (Lowth.)

V. 3—5. It is generally supposed that the prophet here refers to the proclamation of Cyrus, and to the return of the Jews to Jerusalem; as their fathers had come out of Egypt to Canaan, through a vast wilderness: and it is considered as a command to make all things ready for their safe and commodious passage. But the Lord's coming to his people, not their return to Jerusalem, is predicted; and though his protecting presence with them on that occasion may be alluded to; yet this forms a feeble interpretation, compared with that of the Holy Spirit in the New Testament. (Marg. Ref.) John Baptist, in the desert part of the land, (an apt emblem of the barren state of the Jewish church at that time,) was a herald sent to proclaim the approach of Christ, as JEHOVAH their God.—

6 The voice said, [n] Cry. And he said, What shall I cry? [o] All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field:

8 The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: but [p] the word of our God shall stand for ever.

When great princes, at the head of their armies, march through countries, where highways are not previously cast up, they are used to send pioneers before them, to level the country, to cut ways through impervious mountains and defiles, to make bridges over rivers, and to cast up roads through morasses and deep valleys, and to make their march as straight and unobstructed as they can. A spiritual preparation of a similar nature was to be made for the coming of Christ, and the setting up of his kingdom. Thus John Baptist's ministry was calculated to excite the attention of the people; to convince, alarm, and humble them; to subvert their self-confident prejudices and carnal expectations; to show them their need of a spiritual redemption, and to raise their expectations of those blessings, which the Messiah was actually to bestow on them. This tended to prepare the way of the Lord, and to make all straight and level for his reception, and the setting up of his kingdom. And the first Jewish converts to Christianity seem to have been in general prepared by John's ministry for that of Christ and his apostles. Thus the glory of the Lord was revealed to them, and through them to the Gentiles; this light hath hitherto been continued to many nations, and at length "all flesh shall see it together, for "the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it." The Septuagint here reads, "All flesh shall see the salvation of our "God;" and this is quoted by St. Luke (iii. 6.) 'The 'Jewish church was at that time in a barren and desert 'condition, unfit without reformation for the reception of 'her King. It was in this desert country, at that time 'destitute of all religious instruction, in true piety and 'good works unfruitful, that John was sent to prepare 'the way of the Lord by preaching repentance.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 6—8. The voice of God directed the prophet, (or John Baptist, who was predicted,) to make a solemn proclamation; 'And what is the import of it?' 'That the 'people, the flesh, is of a vain temporary nature; that all 'its glory fadeth, and is soon gone; but that the word of 'God endureth for ever. What is this but a plain opposition of the carnal Israel to the spiritual; of the temporary Mosaic economy to the eternal Christian dispensation? You may be ready to conclude, (the prophet 'may be supposed to say,) that my commission is only 'to comfort you with a promise of the restoration of your 'religion, and the polity of Jerusalem, and the temple, and 'its services and worship in all its outward splendour: 'but these are earthly, temporary, shadowy, fading things: 'these are not worthy to engage your attention, in comparison of the greater blessings, the spiritual redemption, 'the eternal inheritance. The law is only the shadow 'of good things; the substance is the Gospel, which shall 'never be done away, but endure for ever.' (Bp. Lowth.) The impotency of man, in all his glory, to oppose the purposes of God, seems also intended. Thus the Chaldean prosperity withered when the Jews were to be delivered; and the Jews lost all their honours and privileges, when the kingdom of Christ was to be established. The carnal expectations of the Jews, respecting the nature of the Redeemer's kingdom may likewise be adverted to. The word translated glory, properly signifies excellency, moral excellency, even justice, truth and mercy: and thus the passage shows the vanity and insufficiency of all human virtues, as well as accomplishments and splendours, without the word of the Gospel, which endureth for ever, and that regeneration which renders it effectual. (Note, 1 Pet. i. 23—25.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. The former part of this paragraph is rendered by some, "O thou, that bringest good tidings to "Zion," &c. And as it is in the feminine gender, it is supposed to allude to the custom of women leading companies, with songs and dances, to celebrate great deliverances; as in the cases of Miriam, and Jephthah's daughter. But as Zion and Jerusalem evidently mean the inhabitants of Zion, and as the glad tidings are ordered to be declared to the cities of Judah; the alteration seems by no means adviseable. When any of the inhabitants of Zion brought glad tidings from the court of Persia; they were strenuously to publish them to the cities of Judah, encouraging them with the assurance of the presence and help of Israel's God. But this is but a shadow of the real meaning. The glad tidings of the advent of Christ was not only brought to Zion; but was from thence sent forth into the cities of Judah, and to all the ends of the earth. The first preachers of the Gospel, after the day of Pentecost, published their glad tidings with all boldness, beginning at Jerusalem, proceeding to the cities of Judah, and then to the Gentiles. The church, the true Zion, should from age to age thus strenuously disseminate the glad tidings of salvation; and the most distinguished Christians should animate those that are less eminent and more timid. The Jews were directed thus to encourage each other to expect their promised Messiah, until he came: we ought thus to excite one another to expect his coming to render his cause triumphant, and finally to judge the world. In all these respects Zion is commanded to proclaim to all her children, and to all the earth, "Behold your God!" 'O Zion and 'Jerusalem, do ye proclaim to all the world, the goodness 'of your God to you, and therefore take all advantage of 'the highest mountains to publish it. Since it is to you 'that God imparts the first tidings of a Saviour, do ye 'gladly and zealously divulge it to all the earth; and say 'to the other cities of Judah concerning the Messiah to be 'exhibited in the flesh,' "Behold your God." (Bp. Hall.) (Matt. xxviii. 18—20. Mark xvi. 15. Luke xxiv. 47. Acts xiii. 46, 47.) For the Lord GOD, or the Lord JEHOVAH, (as in the original,) would come "with a strong hand," or "against a strong one," even that potent enemy of the Church, of whom persecuting tyrants have always been both types and agents: his own arm would both establish his authority, and administer his kingdom: the recompense of his humiliation and sufferings, (namely, the exaltation of his human nature, the salvation of his people, and the honour of all the divine perfections,) was with him; (Heb. xii. 2:) or, he came prepared to reward his true disciples, and punish his obstinate enemies. His work was before him, and he was fully purposed and qualified to go through with it. His condescension and tenderness to his flock of redeemed sinners would equal his power and wrath against his enemies. He would as a Shepherd supply all their wants, and watch over their souls, and consider all their infirmities, maladies, and dangers; he would collect together young converts, feeble believers, and tempted afflicted persons, with especial care; affording them protection and consolation, and moderating their trials: even as the tender shepherd takes the feeble and half-starved lamb, and cherishes it in his bosom, and is peculiarly careful not to over-drive or injure the pregnant ewes, or those that have lately brought forth their young. As this is an evident prophecy of Christ, and as he is the good Shepherd; so he must be Israel's God and the Lord JEHOVAH: nor can these prophecies be otherwise interpreted, without obscuring and wresting their plain meaning, and causing this most elegant and sublime of all writers to express himself in the most improper and discordant manner; or rather, without representing the language of the Holy Spirit as calculated to mislead the simple and honest reader.

V. 12—17. There is no intimation of any change of person, in the transition from our tender Shepherd to this most sublime representation of JEHOVAH: so that this divine majesty is evidently ascribed to the Son equally with the Father; for "He and the Father are One." This seems especially introduced to remind the Jews of JEHOVAH's power to effect their deliverance from Babylon, and that spiritual redemption typified by it. The grandeur of the passage, in sentiment and expression, as much exceeds all the admired sublimity of uninspired writers, as the light of the sun doth that of a taper: and we should not only consider in it the sublimity of a poet; but also that of a prophet speaking of the infinite God, in language worthy of his subject, as far as human language can be so.—No representations of this kind in the writings of men, that have not evidently been taken from the Scripture, give satisfaction to the reflecting mind, but always appear to degrade the subject. But here the mind grasps at, yet cannot contain, the majestic sentiments: and is satisfied, that thus it behooves JEHOVAH to speak of himself, if he would convey any ideas of his incomprehensible perfections to our narrow and clouded understandings. To determine the quantity of water for the earth and ocean, by meting it out in the hollow of his hand, and the extent of the heavens by his span! to give out the dust, of which the dry land is formed, by a small measure! and to weigh the hills and mountains in a balance, when he proportioned them in creation! what thoughts are these, and how do they lead the mind to enlarged apprehensions of the greatness of the Creator, and cause all created beings to shrink as it were, to nothing in the comparison! Could this glorious Lord want any counsellor, or coadjutor? Did it behoove any of his creatures to dictate to him, how he should act with wisdom and justice? or could any pretend that they had thus instructed him? Indeed all the nations of the earth are to him, but as a drop of water from the bucket, to the immensity of the ocean; or as the small disregarded dust upon the balance to the whole earth: He removeth all the isles of the sea as an atom: and all the cedars of Lebanon would not suffice for fuel, nor all its cattle for a burnt-offering, if a sacrifice worthy of his majesty should be attempted: much less could such an oblation atone for the sins committed against him. But no illustration can reach the truth; for all nations before God are as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing, and vanity; and so are all their magnificence, and their ostentatious superstitions.

18 To [k] whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto him?

19 The [l] workman melteth a graven image, and the goldsmith spreadeth it over with gold, and casteth silver chains.

20 He that * is so impoverished that he hath no oblation, [m] chooseth a tree that will not rot; he seeketh unto him a cunning workman to prepare a graven image that [n] shall not be moved.

21 Have [o] ye not known? have ye not heard? hath it not been told you from the beginning? have ye not understood from the foundations of the earth?

22 † It is he [p] that sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and [q] the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers; that [r] stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in:

23 That [s] bringeth the princes to nothing; he maketh the judges of the earth as vanity.

24 Yea, [t] they shall not be planted; yea, they shall not be sown: yea, their stock shall not take root in the earth: and [u] he shall also blow upon them, and they shall wither, [x] and the whirlwind shall take them away as stubble.

25 To [y] whom then will ye liken me, or shall I be equal? saith the Holy One.

26 [z] Lift up your eyes on high, and behold [a] who hath created these things, that [b] bringeth out their host by number: he calleth them all by names, [c] by the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth.

27 ¶ Why [d] sayest thou, O Jacob, and speakest, O Israel, My way is hid from the LORD, and [e] my judgment is passed over from my God?

28 Hast [f] thou not known? hast thou not heard, that [g] the everlasting God, the LORD, the Creator of [h] the ends of the earth, [i] fainteth not, neither is weary? there is [k] no searching of his understanding.

29 He [l] giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength.

V. 18—20. In the view of the divine glory above given, how abominable and absurd must idolatry appear! what similitude can be made of God, that is not infinitely dishonourable to him? Yet how general has this absurd and impious conduct been among men! (Notes, Ex. xx. 4, 5.)—The more wealthy of the Gentiles cast their images of inferior metal, and then employed the goldsmith to plate it with gold, and both to adorn and fasten it with silver chains; and this was intended as the likeness of their god, and the object of their worship! Nay, the poor man, who could scarcely afford an oblation, must have an idol, though it were but a block of durable wood, skilfully carved, and fixed up in his house! and even the Jews, though better instructed, were prone to the same stupidity; because they disliked the character and service of JEHOVAH. But as they had no reason to fear either idols or idolaters, when God came to effect their promised deliverances; so nothing could so much provoke God to jealousy, and bring ruin upon them, as this iniquity. 'Hereby he armeth them 'against the idolatry, wherewith they should be tempted 'at Babylon.'

V. 21—24. "Will ye not know? Will ye not hear? "Hath it not been declared to you," &c. (Bp. Lowth.) This is more literal than our version. Would not the people after all understand? Would they not hearken to the word of God, which approved itself so fully to their minds and consciences? Had not the Jews known, and heard from the beginning? Nay, had not the Gentiles sufficient information from the foundations of the earth, and in the things created, concerning the eternal power and Godhead of the Creator. (Marg. Ref.) 'The words run thus in 'the original,' "Have ye not understood," or considered "the foundations of the earth?" "that is, by whom "they were laid, even by Him that sitteth," &c. (Lowth.) He sitteth upon his throne in the heavens, which environ the earth as a circle: thence he beholds the puny efforts of all its inhabitants, like those of insignificant grasshoppers. He hath veiled himself with the vast expanse of the firmament, as with a curtain; and dwells beyond it, in invisible glory, as in a pavilion. And, disdaining the ambition and rebellion of wicked princes, he brings them and their devices to nothing; so that they cannot establish their posterity, as they purpose; for he will not suffer them to be planted, nor sown, nor to take root: but in anger he blows on them, and they wither, and are driven away as the stubble by the whirlwind. The revolutions in the great empires of the world are intended, especially the subversion of the Babylonish empire by Cyrus, which made way for the restoration of the Jews. Nebuchadnezzar and his successors had attempted to perpetuate the grandeur of their family; but the Lord blew upon it, and it all came to nothing.

V. 25, 26. Nothing else could be mentioned which might be likened to JEHOVAH, except the sun, moon, and stars. But who had created these splendid luminaries? They were his host, numbered, marshalled, and commanded by him, as if he spake to them by name: and because of the exceeding greatness of his mighty power, not one of them failed to fulfil his will, and shine in its appointed season, from age to age.

V. 27—31. Jacob is here introduced as in great affliction, as the Jews were in their captivity, and the church under antichristian persecution. Every external appearance was discouraging; and they were apt to forget or distrust, the power and promise of God, through long delays, many disappointments, and unbelief; and to conclude that the Lord either disregarded them, or knew not how to deliver them; and that he had neglected to judge betwixt them and their oppressors. But why should they harbour such thoughts? Had they never heard, or known, that the everlasting God, JEHOVAH, the Creator of the world, was incapable of being wearied out, or of fainting, or leaving his work unfinished? There was no searching out of his understanding: and therefore he could not be disconcerted by unforeseen obstructions, nor for want of resources to obviate difficulties. When his wisdom should see the proper season to be arrived, he would certainly effect their deliverance: by his help, the most feeble and intimidated instruments would acquire great and increasing strength and courage. And whilst men of great abilities and resolution, who confided in their own vigour, (as young men are apt to do,) would faint and be wearied out, in all their attempts to save themselves, or effect their purposes, they who waited on the Lord for wisdom and support, should repair the decays of their spiritual strength after every conflict, and make continual accessions to it, till they mounted aloft, as on eagles' wings, out of the reach of their enemies; nor would they grow weary in their race, or faint in their walk, till they reached the glorious goal, and received the conqueror's crown.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

They who walk with God need comforting, especially when iniquity abounds, and the church is in tribulation: accordingly he hath commanded his ministers to encourage the broken-hearted, as well as to warn the unruly: and should the servant neglect or mistake his duty, the Lord himself will speak comfortably to them. All our deliverances follow the pardon of iniquity; and in the great atonement of the death of Christ, the mercy of God is exercised to the exceeding glory of his justice. This is the fountain of all our consolations, and ensures a happy event to the warfare of the church and every believer. Even in this desert world, where nothing but noxious creatures and productions, through man's apostacy, would otherwise have been found, a voice is heard calling on us to prepare the way of the Lord; for he cometh "to bless us, in turning "every one of us from our iniquities." May he prepare our hearts by the instructions of his word and the convictions of his Spirit, cordially to welcome his salvation, and submit to his authority; that, every prejudice being done away, every proud and ambitious thought brought down, every grovelling passion subdued, the desire of things truly excellent and honourable implanted, our crooked and rugged tempers softened, and every obstruction removed: the glory of the Lord may be revealed to our souls; and we may be made ready for his whole will on earth, and meet for his heavenly kingdom. And may his power remove all hinderances to the establishment of his kingdom throughout the earth; that his glory may be so revealed, that all flesh may see it together! The Lord alone is worthy of unreserved confidence and fear. And what are all the connexions, possessions, distinctions, attainments, or performances of fallen man, but as the grass and the flower of the grass? When the Lord bloweth upon it with the breath of his displeasure, how soon it withers and fades! And what will the envied and admired titles and accomplishments of a dying sinner avail him, when they leave him under condemnation, and "a vessel of wrath fitted for destruction?" But they who rely on the word of God, which endureth for ever, shall possess unfading and eternal distinctions and treasures, however poor and despised they are here on earth. These are the glad tidings brought unto us by Zion's harbingers: may we gladly receive the word, and diligently diffuse it around! All, who know this joyful sound, should thus endeavour, by their bold and open profession of the truth, their holy examples, their fervent prayers, and all their influence, to communicate the blessing to others. And let ministers especially cry aloud and not spare, and point out to all who inquire after salvation, the divine Redeemer, saying, "Behold your God!" Behold the Lord JEHOVAH hath come in the flesh to destroy the works of the devil: he hath finished the work on earth; he hath ascended his mediatorial throne in heaven; all power is in his hands, and his Arm shall rule for him, his reward is with him, and his work before him. Whilst he crushes his obstinate foes under his feet, he feeds his purchased flock with inexpressible tenderness and care; and he is ever ready to gather in the new convert, to cherish the feeble, the tempted, and afflicted, and to proportion the strength of every one to the trials allotted him. May we know our Shepherd's voice, and follow him, and by our gentle harmless conduct prove ourselves the sheep of his pasture: may he gather our children and relations, as his lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom: and may continually numbers of those, who are as sheep going astray, be brought back to this Shepherd and Bishop of our souls! For who is he, but Israel's Shepherd, "that measured the "waters in the hollow of his hand?" This is the support of all our hopes, that, with the Father and the blessed Spirit, our Jesus is JEHOVAH, God over all blessed for evermore.

him, deeply sensible of our meanness as creatures, and our vileness as sinners: and let us never presume to object to his appointments or decisions, as if we were qualified to teach Him knowledge, before whom all nations are as nothing and vanity. And what are all man's attempts to expiate his own sins and merit an eternal inheritance? It costs more than the whole creation to ransom our souls, and must have been let alone for ever, if the only begotten of the Father had not given himself for us, a sacrifice of infinite value. With this God is well pleased: but all the power, wisdom, pride, and ostentation of sinful creatures, are with him less than nothing, abominable, as well as vain. Surely fallen man's boasted reason is a blind guide in religion; when he has always been prone to represent God by images made like to corruptible man, or the inferior creatures! And though we do not now generally make images of gold, silver, wood, or stone, to worship them: we are apt to conceive of God, as being such an one as ourselves. Yet, we at least have abundant opportunity of becoming so acquainted with his perfections, (were not our carnal minds enmity to him;) as to be convinced, that we can conceive nothing in the smallest degree proper to represent him to our minds; except it be his holy image renewed upon the souls of believers, which gives us some faint idea of his moral excellency: but of his infinite majesty we can form no conception. Wretched then are the mightiest princes, who rebel against him: he will soon reduce them to the most abject contempt and misery; and all their schemes, of aggrandizing themselves and their descendants, will be as vain, as if the stubble could attempt resistance to the furious whirlwind. But though we cannot find out the Almighty to perfection, it behooves us to look about us, and to view his glory in the works of his hands. The heavens and all the hosts of them proclaim his eternal power and Godhead; and the strength of his arm continues them in their settled courses, with a punctuality that can never be sufficiently admired. Nor let us forget, that he who retaineth the planets in their orbits, spake all the promises, and stands engaged to perform them. Why then should believers despond, either respecting themselves, or the common cause of godliness? Their way, though dark to them, cannot be hid from him, and he will plead their cause and execute judgment for them. When the everlasting God hath begun his work of grace, he will never faint, nor be weary, nor withdraw his hand, till he have perfected it. But we should confide in his unsearchable wisdom, to perform his promises to us and to his church in his own time and manner; neither discouraged by the sense of our own weakness, nor by a view of the power of our enemies: as the Lord giveth power to the faint, nay, to those who have no might he causeth strength to abound. Let us then watch against unbelief, pride, and self-confidence: for if we go forth in our own strength, we shall faint, and utterly fall, however strong we may think ourselves. But if we wait on the Lord, out of weakness we shall be made strong; and having our hearts and hopes in heaven, we shall be carried above all difficulties, and be enabled to press forward, and lay hold of the prize of our high calling in Christ Jesus.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1. JEHOVAH speaks through the whole of this chapter. He here calls on the most distant nations in reverent silence to hearken to the proofs which he is about to give, that he is the only true God, and that all their idols are nothing: and when they had attentively considered the subject, let them collect all their resolution, and draw near to plead their cause; that the controversy might at length be finally decided, whether JEHOVAH or their idols ought to be worshipped.

V. 2—4. Some eminent expositors suppose Cyrus to be here meant: but it is not likely that he should be called "the righteous man;" or righteousness, as in the original; nor could the success of that monarch give any general alarm to idolaters: and indeed this does not comport with that scheme of interpretation which seems most satisfactory. JEHOVAH is pointing out to idolaters the evidences of his being the only true God, and is about to predict those events which will terminate in the extermination of idolatry: but he previously calls the attention of the people to the victories, that had already been obtained by his worshippers over idolaters. The calling of Abraham, from the eastern country of Mesopotamia, was the first remarkable check, which God gave to idolatry after the flood, when it was about to become universal; and the opening of that grand design, by which the whole empire of Satan was in due time to be subverted. As the pattern of all future believers, both in the manner of his justification and the effects of his faith, Abraham was properly distinguished as "the righteous man." The Lord called him "to his "foot," that is, to follow him in the most implicit and unreserved confidence and obedience. And though he was not generally a warrior, yet, relying on the power of JEHOVAH, he once marched forth at the head of a small company of his servants, against four victorious heathen kings and their armies: and God gave them before him, and made him master of them; so that they became as dust, or stubble driven by the wind, before his sword and bow: and he pursued them with entire safety, through those parts of the land, into which he had never before travelled. (Notes, Gen. xiv.) This, and other interpositions of God in his favour, gave him a great ascendency over kings and nations: and were earnests of the victories which were promised to his posterity, and in due time granted. The king and people of Egypt first fell before the God of Israel; and then Arad, Sihon, and Og, and their subjects, and the nations of Canaan: and thus Abraham, in his seed, ruled over many kings and nations. These events were notorious, and caused great alarms in the adjacent regions. Now, who effected these victories of Israel over the idolaters? even He, that had predicted them, and had from the beginning called the generations of Israel from among the rest of the nations, speaking of them as already existing. And as JEHOVAH, the self-existent and eternal God, had been present with his people at first, so he would be to the last, to support them, and render them triumphant. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 5—7. The success that attended the servants of JEHOVAH, is here represented as exciting the apprehensions of the most distant nations, lest the cause of idolatry should be ruined. So that, being instigated by that ambitious spirit, who is worshipped by idolaters as the god of this world, they combine together, and encourage each other to support their stupid worship, and render it prevalent against the cause of God and Israel. This was the case when Israel conquered Canaan; and in their wars with the Philistines, &c. (Marg. Ref.) It was still more remarkably so, when Christianity was established on the ruins of Pagan idolatry: and we have reason to expect a similar scene when antichristian idolatry shall be extirpated. The word rendered carpenter, is in the former chapter translated workman, and joined with melteth, (19.) Probably some of the images were carved of wood, and covered with plates of gold.

V. 8, 9. The Lord in disdain leaves the idolaters to weary themselves in forming their idols, and strengthening their cause; and addresses himself to his people, to encourage them with assurances of support and victory. Israel was the servant and worshipper of JEHOVAH, through his gracious choice of him, and as the seed of Abraham, whom he had favoured and honoured with the peculiar name and privileges of his friend. Abraham had been called out of Mesopotamia, and the Israelites out of Egypt, from among the chief men of the earth: and the Lord still adhered to his choice; for though he had corrected and proved them by many adversities, yet he had not cast them off. But in these respects Israel was a type of the chosen seed, who are brought from every part of the earth into this Church, made the servants, the friends, and children of God, who will never reject them, or leave them to perish, (Marg. Ref.) The word translated taken, seems equivalent to that used by St. Paul, concerning his own conversion: "for which also "I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." (Phil. iii. 12.)

V. 10—14. "Fear not—for I have strengthened thee, "I have assisted thee, I have supported thee with my "faithful right hand." (Bp. Lowth.) Past deliverances are mentioned, to encourage the expectation of future protection and support. The security and victories of the Church are, however, here predicted and promised: and the prophecy is couched in such terms, as can only be answered by the most complete triumph of true religion over idolatry and iniquity; yet at the same time it consists of promises, suited to the encouragement of believers through successive ages. They know themselves to be feeble, and see the cause of godliness destitute of external defence: but they are assured, that the Lord is with his Church; and every true member of it; therefore they ought not to be dismayed by the number, or power of their enemies. JEHOVAH himself will strengthen, assist, and uphold his people, with his powerful arm performing his faithful promises, and maintaining his righteous cause. The powerful monarchies, that have been incensed against the Church, and have contended with her, have been put to shame, and brought to nothing: and this prediction hath already been fulfilled, in the ruin of the Egyptian, Assyrian, Chaldean, Macedonian, and Roman empires, which we now may seek for in vain; for no vestiges of the three former, and scarcely any of the last, can be found, whilst the Church still subsists! In like manner all that now do, or hereafter shall contend with her, shall perish. For JEHOVAH leads his people by the right hand to the conflict; and both inspires them with courage and strength, and fights for them: and though they are as worms, in the contempt poured upon them, in their own humble sense of their weakness and vileness, and in their low and abject condition, and few in comparison with their enemies: yet their Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, will render them victorious.—'God's truth shall 'at last prevail against all opposition: and the kingdom 'of Christ shall subdue and break in pieces all its adver-'saries.' (Lowth.)

V. 15, 16. Deep rooted idolatrous empires, and systems of superstition and imposture, are like impassable mountains, and form obstructions to the propagation of the Gospel, insuperable to man; but the Lord will furnish his Church, from time to time, with proper instruments to destroy, or move out of the way, and even to disperse all remains of them. Something of this kind was done, in the ruin of the Chaldean monarchy, in order to Israel's deliverance from captivity. Much more in the subversion of the Pagan Roman empire, in order to the establishment of Christianity: but future events will more signally illustrate the propriety of the metaphors here employed, which are taken from the methods of threshing and winnowing corn, which were then in use. (Notes, xxviii. 23—29.)

V. 17—20. The care taken to water and victual and protect the poor Jews, when they returned from Babylon, as their fathers were provided for in the wilderness; and the re-establishment of their Church and state, in the desolated land of Judah, form but feeble accomplishments of this remarkable prophecy. We have met with repeated predictions of the conversion of the Gentiles under similar allusions. (Marg. Ref.) The provision that is made for the consolation of the poor and humble people of God, in all their distresses and persecutions from age to age, may be implied: but perhaps some intimation may also be given of the method in which he will accomplish his promises of spreading the Gospel. By "the poor and needy, who seek "water and find none," the Lord seems to describe the case of people destitute of the means of grace, yet brought to some indistinct and anxious desires of instruction and spiritual blessings. Cornelius and his friends, (the first Gentile converts,) were thus prepared to receive the Gospel, before it was sent to them: and Paul was called into Europe by a vision of a man of Macedonia, who begged him to come over and help them. Indeed we know not in what degree the Lord may facilitate the spread of Christianity in due time, by exciting anxious desires of instruction and salvation in the minds of those who have not hitherto heard the Gospel. Such desires will dictate earnest prayers, and the Lord will hear them, and not leave the suppliants destitute. Thus rivers, fountains, and wells of salvation, shall be opened in the most unlikely places; and trees of righteousness, both ornamental and fruitful, shall flourish in abundance, throughout the barren desert of the Gentile world. As these predictions shall be more and more accomplished, the power, truth, and love of God, will be seen, known, and considered more generally; and the progress of the Gospel will be with accelerated motion, as the stone falls to the earth with increasing rapidity. "I will "plant in the wilderness the cedar," &c.; 'as it were on pur-'pose for my people in their return home from the scorching

V. 21—24. In these prophecies JEHOVAH speaks to mankind through all generations; and as his predictions are accomplished, his arguments gather force. Let the nations, in the mean time, plead for their idols, and produce their most cogent arguments. Let them bring forth some ancient authenticated oracles, that had already received as signal an accomplishment as the prophecies made to Abraham or to Israel; nay, let them give some satisfactory account of the creation of the world, and the transactions of former times, which might stand in competition with that given by Moses; and foretel the event of them. Or let them now utter some prophecies, like these of JEHOVAH's prophet, which, coming to pass, might justify their claim to be worshipped as gods: nay, let them interpose to inflict miraculous judgments upon their despisers, or to effect miraculous deliverances for their worshippers: that the people of God might evidently behold it together, and be dismayed; as the Egyptians, Canaanites, and Assyrians had been, at the wonderful works of God. But indeed the idols and their works were alike nothing, and they who chose them in preference to the true God, were an abomination to him. "Let those of your idols, which ye think "most powerful, approach." (Jerom.) 'I prefer this to 'all other interpretations of this place. The false gods are 'called upon to come forth and appear in person, and to 'give evident proofs of their foreknowledge and power by 'foretelling future events, and exerting their power in 'doing good or evil.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 25. JEHOVAH here predicts the victories of Cyrus over the Chaldeans and their allies, at least a hundred and fifty years before that expedition was undertaken; as one instance of his foreknowledge and invincible power. Media lay north of Babylon, and Persia eastward, and Cyrus commanded the forces of these two nations. The Lord raised him up to great power, and formed him a man of extraordinary courage and capacity. Though we do not read that he renounced idolatry to become the worshipper of God only; yet his decree proves, that he paid some honour and worship to his name, and thus may be said to have called on him; (Ezra i. 1, 2.) and by his wonderful success he trampled down mighty monarchs, as mortar, or as the potter treads the clay. We shall perceive as we go on that the deliverance of the Jews was a typical event; and consequently Cyrus was a typical person.

V. 26. This is another challenge to idolaters, to prove that their idols had ever declared future events in this manner: that it might be confessed they had a righteous claim to adoration. But, in fact, none of them ever showed, or declared any thing of the kind; none ever heard their words to this effect. It is probable, that the Sybelline books, and other pretended prophecies among the heathens, were framed in consequence of this challenge, through the subtlety of Satan, and to evade the force of this argument; and the most plausible part of them seems to have been pillaged from the prophecies of Scripture. Doubtless fallen angels possess vast conjectural foresight; and, if permitted, could give general intimations of future events, which might frequently come to pass accordingly. But the certain knowledge of futurity must be peculiar to God, who hath formed his whole plan, and in performing it fulfils at once his decrees and predictions. In fact, all prophecies, except those of the Bible, have been couched in ambiguous terms, and the performance has been dubious and uncertain. They have been exactly such as might previously have been expected from the subtlety, sagacity, and foresight of the highest created intelligence apostatized from God, and excluded from all acquaintance with his secret decrees: and a few occasional instances, in which they have come to pass, have been used to hide the shame of numerous failures; or their ambiguity has prevented the detection of them. But the prophecies of Scripture form a regular system, which is fulfilling from age to age, without any failure, or appearance of it. The time of accomplishment was in several instances named, and the exact performance may be demonstrated; and some evidently relate to future times; being so arranged that we can tell very nearly the period, in the series of predicted events, in which we live. And this forms the grand demonstration of the divine original of the Scriptures, on which the Lord himself here evidently rests the weight of the argument; and it gathers strength in proportion as that from transient miracles may be supposed to lose some part of its energy.

V. 27—29. JEHOVAH, the First and the Last, (4;) first gave notice to Zion of future deliverers, the Medes and Persians: and he sent his prophets to announce the glad tidings of their redemption, before the commencement of their captivity. Now which of the idols of the Gentiles could do the like? The more the case was examined, the plainer did it appear that they could give no counsel to their worshippers, or answer to such inquiries; for they were all vanity, wind, and confusion.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

When the religion of the Bible, and the ground on which it rests, are reverently and carefully investigated, they are found to have undoubted reason and argument on their side. But the enmity of men's hearts, against the humbling holy truths and precepts of this precious book, disposes them rather to strengthen themselves, and collect together every apparent argument and objection that they can devise against them, than impartially to examine with a disposition to be convinced and governed by them. Yet the question must be decided at length: and however men now plead in behalf of error, infidelity, or impiety, they will have nothing to say, when they draw near together to meet the Lord upon his judgment seat. Every work of God, in performing the prophecies and promises of his word, irrefragably proves his right to our confidence and obedience: and it is worth our while to consider all that he hath done, from the beginning to this day, in fulfilling the antecedent revelations of his word. We should begin from the calling of righteous Abraham, and consider his care of that patriarch, and of Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph: we should review his wonders in Egypt, at the Red Sea, in the wilderness, and in Canaan: we should meditate on the wars of the Lord under Joshua, the Judges, Samuel and David, and on the wonders performed for Israel during the reigns of Asa, Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah: and remember, that the authenticity of these histories is fully ascertained by the concurring prophecies fulfilling to this day. We should next reflect on the return of the captive Jews from Babylon, and their preservation during the prevalence of successive conquerors and oppressors, until the birth of the promised Seed of the woman, the Seed of Abraham and Son of David. We should compare with these ancient prophecies the history of his character, miracles, doctrine, life, death, resurrection, and kingdom; the establishment of his religion in the world, and its continuance hitherto; notwithstanding the opposition against it from without, and the various methods within, that have been employed to corrupt it. We should also turn aside to contemplate the desolations of Nineveh, Babylon, and Tyre; and also those of Jerusalem, when the Saviour was rejected by his professed people: and whilst the New Testament authenticates all these predictions, we may behold its divine authority demonstrated, in the dispersion and preservation of the Jews as a distinct people; in the long continued corruptions of popery; and in a variety of other events, which cannot here be particularized. Now, who hath wrought and done all these things, according to these ancient predictions, but the everlasting God, who hath also predicted the ruin of idolaters, and unbelievers, and the full salvation of his people? Well may determined infidels and idolaters be dismayed, at hearing and seeing such things: for all their efforts to uphold their tottering cause will be in vain; it will shortly be ruined, and every remaining prediction will also be performed.

V. 8—20.

Happy are the chosen and righteous servants of the Lord, whom he hath called to be his friends, and to walk with him by faith, and in holy obedience. If we have thus been favoured, let us not yield to fear in the prospect of dangers or enemies: our God will be our Guide and Strength, in every service and difficulty: our conflict may be sharp, but our victory will be sure; all, who hate, oppose, or harass us, shall be as nothing; and we shall shortly be out of their reach, and see them no more for ever. Why then do we hesitate to pass through scenes of tribulation or persecution; or even through the gloomy valley of death, when the Lord God will hold our right hand, and both inspire courage and consolation? And though we be weak and vile as worms, and the church consist hitherto of but a few despised men, struggling with difficulties like the strong mountains: yet our God will carry us above them all: he will provide for the subverting of every empire on earth, which supports the great empire of Satan, and they shall all be reduced to nothing, or driven away as chaff by the whirlwind; that we may rejoice in the Lord, and glory in the Holy One of Israel. These are the blessings reserved for the poor in spirit, and such as hunger and thirst after righteousness; who are become acquainted with the truth of their own character, situation, wants, and best interests, and who long for divine illumination, pardon, holiness, and spiritual consolation. Wherever they are placed, or how long soever the desired blessings are delayed, and they seek water, and find none, and their tongue faileth for thirst; or however, through conscious guilt, or weakness of faith, they may think that the Lord will leave them destitute: yet he will hear their prayers, and answer them, and not forsake them. In his infinite truth, power, wisdom, and mercy, and in the unsearchable riches of Christ, they have a never-failing resource: and the Lord will supply all their wants, by means as unexpected as if rivers should be opened on the tops of mountains, and fountains in the valleys. And as he hath planted trees of righteousness in the barren Gentile lands; so will he render our barren souls fruitful in all the precious, ornamental, and pleasant fruits of his Spirit; that all, who behold, "may consider, and understand together, that the hand of the Lord hath done "it, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it."

V. 21—29.

Let the advocates for other doctrines than that of God our Saviour, now produce their cause, and bring forth their strong arguments: can they show such effects from their soothing and self-flattering systems? Or can the infidel answer the arguments from prophecy for the divine original of the Scriptures? Can he match them with equal predictions from the oracles of reason? Or satisfactorily explain the appearances in the natural and moral world? Can he prescribe an effectual cure for human depravity? Or give proof to a reflecting mind, that he can establish any system of equal value with that which he labours to degrade? Until he evidently does these things, we must aver, that his cavils spring from pride and enmity to God and holiness, and are as irrational as they are impious; that they are worse than nothing, and vanity; and those that choose them are an abomination. But a deliverer is raised up for us of nobler name and greater power, than the deliverer of the captive Jews: he will trample all his powerful enemies under his feet, that when He who from the beginning hath declared these things shall fulfil them, all may acknowledge that he is righteous. He alone sends those, who bring good tidings unto Zion; and all they that are not employed by him, can give no good counsel or instruction, solve the difficulties of distressed sinners, or speak one word to the purpose. May we then receive his salvation, cast away all our idols, and turn away our ears from hearing, and our eyes from beholding vanity; may we be numbered amongst his obedient servants and faithful friends, and rejoice in his holy consolation, in life, in death, and through eternal ages!

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—4. When spiritual blessings are predicted under the veil of temporal deliverances, some passages will accord best to the type, and others to the antitype: thus Cyrus and the redemption of the Jews are in this place lost sight of, that the Messiah and his salvation may be brought into full view. 'The natural import of 'the words, as well as the authority of the New Testament, 'do plainly determine this and many other texts, here and 'in the following chapters, to an evangelical sense. The 'Holy Spirit taking occasion from the deliverance of the 'Jews, to give the prophet a view of a more glorious re-'demption, which should be accomplished by the Messiah.' (Lowth.) 'St. Matthew has applied it to Christ; nor can 'it, with justice or propriety, be applied to any other 'person or character whatever.' (Bp. Lowth.) (Matt. xii. 17—21.) He was "in the form of God, and took upon "him the form of a servant." Being upheld by the divine power in his human nature, he finished the work that was given him to do: he is the first Elect of God, for his own sake, and to be the Head of the Church; and all others are elect in him: in his person, righteousness, and mediation, the Father is well pleased and greatly delighted: the Holy Spirit resteth upon him, and is through him communicated to the Church; (xi. 1—3:) and he brings forth judgment to the Gentiles, or makes known unto them the truths, precepts, and ordinances of God, that they may become accepted believers, obedient servants, and spiritual worshippers of him. He did not appear with ostentatious pomp, attraction and external honour; or to establish his kingdom by the violence and tumult of war and contention: but he was outwardly mean, and behaved with humility, gentleness, and kindness; and acquired his peaceful victories by beneficent miracles, convincing instructions, a holy example, patient sufferings, and divine influences. He is peculiarly tender to the broken-hearted believer, and those whom temptations and afflictions had almost crushed, like the bruised reed; and will by no means break them: he encourages the first beginning of holy desires in the young convert; and revives the almost expiring spark in the baffled and backsliding believer; though it were only as the offensive smoke from the stalks of the flax, when it doth not break forth into a flame: and he will bring forth every man's judgment, with most perfect agreement to the truth of his case and character. In his personal ministry, and in that of his servants, he met with vast difficulties and great opposition; and both he and they were treated with great contempt, enmity, and cruelty: but nothing could induce him to leave his work unfinished, or to be discouraged in it, till he had established judgment, (or the truth, righteousness, and worship of JEHOVAH,) in the earth; and the most distant nations, accepting his salvation, should submit to his authority, and wait his righteous commands. This has hitherto been accomplished but in part; but he will not fail, or be discouraged, till it be more completely effected.

V. 5—7. JEHOVAH before spake of his beloved Son and righteous Servant; here he addresses him. He, the great Creator of heaven and earth, and the Author of the lives and souls of all men, declares that he had called, or appointed Christ "in righteousness;" that is, to manifest his righteousness in the salvation of sinners, to fulfil his faithful engagements to his Church, and to support the cause of righteousness. Upholding and preserving him, he would give him to be the Surety, the Foundation, and the very Substance of the new covenant; and the pledge and security of all the covenanted blessings to his people Israel: and likewise to be the Fountain of knowledge, holiness, and happiness to the Gentiles: in order that he might open those understandings which Satan had blinded, through pride, prejudice, and ignorance; and set at liberty from the bondage or dungeon of sin, those who had been confined in it; that they might enjoy the light, liberty, and comfort of his service. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8, 9. JEHOVAH here again addresses mankind, declaring his essential glory and excellency, and that he would not give the honour and worship which belonged to any other; either fallen angels, or graven images, or even the most excellent and exalted of creatures: for no limitation can be admitted in so general a declaration.—But as we are commanded "to honour the Son, even as we honour the Father," we are sure he is no creature, but one with the Father, in the unity of the divine nature.—It is also added, that as the ancient prophecies were accomplished, new predictions were delivered, for the confirmation of true religion, through successive generations.

V. 10—12. The prophet, animated by the glorious subject, calls on the nations, even to the ends of the earth, and every remote region that navigation hath discovered, with all their inhabitants, to sing praises to JEHOVAH. And he exhorts those dark and barren regions, which are like the Arabian deserts, or the uncultivated top of a rock or mountain, to give glory and praise to him for the blessings of his salvation. (Marg. Ref.) 'The expressions denote 'the joy to be so great and universal, that even the inani-'mate parts of the creation are exhorted to bear a part in 'the general chorus.' (Lowth.) Such exhortations imply predictions, that thus it would be at the time appointed. Indeed the latter part of this passage is future:—"The "wilderness and the cities thereof shall lift their voice," &c.

V. 13—17. The prophet seems at first here to speak, but the Lord soon resumes the subject. Numerous and confederated enemies would obstruct his purpose of converting the Gentiles, and destroying idolatry: but he would, as a mighty warrior, with tremendous indignation, intimidate and destroy them. He had long suffered the nations to walk in their own ways, and idolatry and iniquity to prevail: but at the appointed period he would break silence, and with the most vigorous exertions of his power, and vehement convulsions in providence, he would ruin his enemies and effect his great designs. And as the unbelieving Jews would crucify the Redeemer, and obstruct the Gospel; he would turn their cultivated mountains into a waste, and make their rivers and pools dry land; that is, he would deprive them of their privileges, and cast them off from being his people. But he would bring the blind and benighted Gentiles into his Church, by methods of which they had no previous knowledge; and lead them in the paths of truth, peace, and holiness, to which they had been entire strangers: he would afford them abundant light and instruction, make their way plain and pleasant to them, and not cast them off from being his people. This I suppose to be the prophetical meaning of this passage: but it hath also a spiritual meaning, applicable to every believer. And this union of the prophetical and spiritual meaning forms one of the greatest beauties and excellences of this part of Scripture; and exceedingly illustrates the divine wisdom by which it was dictated. This calling of the Gentiles would be attended with the defeat and confusion of idolaters. This was remarkably the case in the primitive ages of Christianity: but the prophecy will have a more notable completion, when Antichristian, as well as Pagan, image-worshippers shall be confounded, put to shame, and perish.

V. 18—20. The Lord here calls the Gentiles, that had been deaf to his voice and blind to his glory, to hear and see; not without reference to the miracles of Christ. Or, as some think, he upbraids the Jews with their blindness and obstinate unbelief. The nation gloried in being the servants and worshippers of JEHOVAH; yet not only others, but the priests, prophets, and rulers, who were his messengers to the people, were become more blind and deaf than even the Gentiles: and whilst they deemed themselves so perfect, so wise and righteous, that they needed no instructor, and no repentance, and despised others, they were given up to judicial blindness and obduracy.—They saw indeed numerous miracles to prove Christ's mission, yet they did not observe them to any good purpose: and though they attended on his ministry, as opening their ears to his word; yet they neither believed nor obeyed him. (Marg. Ref.) 'The word,' (rendered he that is perfect) 'is meshullam in the Hebrew; whence the 'Arabian mussulman is derived, a title the Mahometans 'give to themselves.' (Lowth.)

V. 21. This verse is variously interpreted. Some explain it of the willingness that the Lord had always shown to fulfil his covenant and promises to Israel, for the sake of showing himself faithful and just; and thus to magnify and honour his word. 'The LORD took delight in this 'people for his righteousness' sake; he hath given them 'an excellent law, and thereby made them honourable.' (Lowth.) But these interpretations seem foreign to the subject of the prophecy, which is allowed to relate to the Messiah and the conduct of the Jews in rejecting him: and if there be any ellipses to be supplied, as in the above translation, the verse may be thus rendered, "The LORD is "well pleased, because of his," (the Messiah's) "righte-"ousness. He" (the Messiah) "will magnify the law, "and render it honourable."—He "brought in an ever-"lasting righteousness;" believers are "made the righte-"ousness of God in him;" "His name is the LORD our "righteousness;" and thus the holy law of God is established in honour and authority, both as to its precept and sanction. In him, the righteous Servant, the Chosen of God, "his soul delighteth;" (Note 1—4.) "This is my "beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased;" for "he al-"ways did those things which pleased" the Father. This accords entirely with the New Testament, and with the scope of the prophecy. The Messiah is the grand subject of the chapter; and seems here intended, though not expressly named, (1 John iii. 16. Greek.) While the Jewish rulers and teachers blindly rejected and crucified him, as an opposer and violator of the divine law, God was well pleased on account of his righteousness, because he magnified the law, by his infinitely valuable obedience unto death, as well as by his holy doctrine: so that, for the sake of his righteousness and atonement, salvation was freely preached to the Jews first, and then to the Gentiles. And when the Jews put it from them, God took pleasure for his righteousness' sake, to magnify and honour his law, by inflicting on them deserved punishment. This connects the verse with those which follow, and shows the whole chapter to be a regular and connected prediction of the coming of Christ, and the events which followed, in the conversion of the Gentiles and the rejection of the Jews, without any direct reference to other events.

V. 22—25. These verses evidently predict the punishment inflicted on the Jewish nation for their obstinate enmity to Christ and the Gospel. For this crime Jerusalem was given up to the Romans, and the Jews have been robbed and spoiled, hunted as wild beasts into a snare, imprisoned, enslaved, and preyed upon, for nearly eighteen hundred years, without deliverer or avenger: whereas seventy years captivity expiated the national guilt of their idolatry; and the Lord delivered and restored them to their own land. As the Jews, from age to age, read this chapter, the Lord calls upon them to reflect on their condition, and the cause and Author of it, and inquires, "Who "amongst them will hearken for the time to come?" Nor can they assign any other reason for their long continued miseries, except the hot displeasure of JEHOVAH; nor any so evident cause of that hot displeasure, as their rejection of their promised Messiah. But though he hath thus poured out upon them his indignation, is become their tremendous enemy, and consumes them with his fiery indignation: yet they know not, and lay it not to heart! and their insensibility forms as striking a demonstration of the truth of the Scripture, as their desolate and unprecedented situation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—12.

All the deliverers of God's people, and all his servants, have been types or subjects of his beloved Son and elect Servant, whom he upholdeth, and in whom he delighteth. Would we make our calling and election sure, and have the Father delight over us for good; we must behold and hear, believe and obey Christ: we must come through his mediation, receive from his fulness, and be directed by him in the ways of truth and righteousness. May he, without failure or delay, place judgment in the earth, and bring all the nations under the sun to welcome his salvation, and wait for his law. Whilst his lowliness and compassion cheer our drooping hearts, and animate our feeble efforts to serve him, with the assurance that he will accept, assist, and comfort the feeblest and most distressed of those that believe in him; we should copy his example, and avoid all harshness and ostentation; we should learn to pity the tempted, to strengthen the weak hands, confirm the feeble knees, and comfort those that are of a fearful heart; not being discouraged, or led to give up useful designs because of obstacles and ill-treatment; "not weary of well doing, "for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." How gracious was the Lord, the eternal Creator and Governor of the world, when instead of sending a powerful avenger among his rebellious creatures, he commissioned his beloved Son to be our Surety, and to mediate a new covenant of peace for all those that believe in him; and to bring poor blinded and enslaved sinners of the Gentiles, into the glorious liberty and marvellous light of his Gospel! How great is his wisdom in rendering this merciful salvation honourable to his justice, and subservient to the cause of holiness on earth! may his Spirit attend his word to open the eyes of sinners in every place, and to turn them from Satan to God and righteousness: and surely we should consider our abilities, wealth, or influence, to be best laid out, in promoting that blessed cause for which the Redeemer shed his precious blood; that God in all things may be glorified, and that idolatry and impiety may be suppressed and exterminated. We should not now expect more prophecies; but we enjoy the benefit of that accumulated evidence, which arises from the completion of former prophecies from age to age. Let us then abound in songs of praise, even in this isle of the sea, whose extensive navigation never brought over so rich a freight, as when it landed the preachers of the Gospel on our shores; for at that time this country was more devoid of spiritual knowledge and grace, than the scorched plains of Kedar ever were of vegetable treasures. Let then the Redeemer's name resound through our cities, villages, plains, and mountains; and let our merchants and sailors give glory to the Lord, and declare his praise.

V. 13—25.

Alas! iniquity and infidelity still abound; and Satan is permitted to deceive the nations of the earth. For a long time JEHOVAH hath holden his peace; and his enemies think, that they shall triumph over his Gospel: but their consternation will equal their anguish, when he shall appear to confound and destroy them, and to desolate whole nations, that have sinned in defiance of his word. All his saints in heaven and on earth will acknowledge, that he "brought them when blind in a way that "they knew not." He met them with his word, when they were not seeking after him: he sent his ministers to their neighbourhood, perhaps against their will; and at length conquered their prejudices and opened their eyes: then he led them in paths of truth and peace, and sometimes of trial and temptation, to which they were utter strangers: but he still made darkness light before them, and crooked things straight: he cleared up their doubts, obviated their perplexities, helped them to surmount obstacles, and did them good by all their troubles: and thus gave them daily proof, that he would never leave nor forsake them, either in temptation, in death, or judgment; when all the worshippers of idols and workers of iniquity shall be confounded together. But, alas! how many professed Christians and nominal ministers are more blind, than even the benighted heathens, so that, whilst the voice of God causeth the deaf to hear and the blind to see; they, who think they do see, and are proud of their knowledge and virtue, are given up to judicial blindness and obstinacy; and all instruction and arguments tend to increase their enmity and guilt! Whilst the Lord is well pleased in saving sinners, through the righteousness of Christ; he will also take pleasure in glorifying his justice, by punishing such proud de-

Promises to Israel of support, deliverance out of trouble, and abundant honour and increase, 1—7. A challenge to idolaters and idols to equal these prophecies, or the miracles wrought by JEHOVAH for his people, 8—13. Predictions of deliverance from Babylon attended with its ruin, and of spiritual redemption, 14—21. Heavy charges against Israel, contrasted with the freeness of God's pardoning mercy to them, 22—28.

BUT now thus saith the LORD that [a] created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel, [b] Fear not; for I have redeemed thee, [c] I have called thee by thy name; [d] thou art mine.

2 When thou [e] passest through the waters, [f] I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: [g] when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.

3 For I am the LORD thy God, [h] the Holy One of Israel, thy Saviour: [i] I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee.

4 Since thou was [k] precious in my sight, [l] thou hast been honourable, and [m] I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy * life.

5 [n] Fear not; for I am with thee: [o] I will bring thy seed from the east, and gather thee from the west:

6 I will say to the north, Give up; and to the south, Keep not back; [p] bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the ends of the earth;

7 Even every one that is [r] called by my name, [s] for I have created him; [t] for my glory, I have formed him; yea, I have made him.

spisers. And the present condition of the Jews is a warning to all such as oppose the Gospel. Who then among them, or among us, will hearken for the time to come? And seeing he hath thus poured out his indignation on that once favoured people, for their sins; let us lay it to heart, and "fear, lest a promise being left us of entering into his "rest, any of us should be found to come short of it."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIII. V. 1, 2. From the conclusion of the preceding chapter, the pious remnant might have concluded, that the Lord was about finally to cast off the whole nation. But he here assures them, that having created them, formed them into a people, redeemed them from their enemies, called them by the name of Israel, (a prince of God,) to be his own inheritance; he would still show them special favours: even as if, by his powerful presence with them, they should pass over seas and rivers; nay, through raging fires, without harm or danger. (Marg. Ref.) Accordingly, the nation being preserved through all the ravages of the Chaldean invasion and through the captivity, was again restored to prosperity; even the desolations which attended and followed the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, did not consume it; but the Jews have been kept distinct from other nations to this day, notwithstanding their dispersions, and the massacres and oppressions to which they have been continually exposed. This is as marvellous an effect of God's power, as if they had passed through vehement flames unscorched, or dry shod through rivers and seas. This seems to be the prophetical meaning; as a promise it ensures the preservation of true believers, through all possible trials and temptations.—'God's elect are called "the work of his hands," (xxix. 23. lx. 21:) 'and these God will never utterly forsake, (Ps. cxxxviii. 8.) 'It is probable, that many of the pro-'mises, here and in the following chapters, relate to the 'general restoration of the Jews.' (Lowth.)

V. 3, 4. When Egypt was desolated, that Israel might be liberated, that nation was given for their ransom. Sennacherib was taken off from besieging Jerusalem, by successful wars against the Egyptians and Ethiopians: and these nations, when vanquished by Cyrus, might be considered as a ransom paid him for the release of the Jews. Or in general, when the preservation of Israel required the ruin of any person or nation, the Lord readily gave it up for their sakes. Before he testified his special regard for them, they were base and contemptible, but his favour rendered them honourable among the nations; and he would persevere in his love, and continue to give the same proofs of it, as heretofore. 'I will not spare any man, rather 'than thou shouldst perish; for God more esteemeth one 'of his faithful, than all the wicked in the world.' "I "will give man for thee," (or Adam, in the singular number.) The clause is thus literally rendered in the old version: "The second Man," (or Adam,) "is the Lord "from heaven:" and "God spared not his own Son, but "delivered him up for us all."

V. 5—7. The Jews were scattered by the Chaldeans into different regions; they were professedly the sons and daughters of the Lord, and called by his name; and they were gradually gathered from their captivity to Jerusalem and Judah. Yet it does not appear that many of them were brought from the west or the south, on that occasion; or that they were generally new created to holiness, and prepared to glorify God, as it is here implied. But the conversion of sinners in every quarter of the globe, to be through Christ the children of God; and the future conversion of the dispersed Jews to Christianity, seem to be 9 Let [x] all the nations be gathered together, and let the people be assembled: [y] who among them can declare this, and shew us former things? let them bring forth their witnesses, [z] that they may be justified; or let them hear, and say, It is truth.

10 Ye are [a] my witnesses, saith the LORD, [b] and my servant whom I have chosen: [c] that ye may know and believe me, and understand that [d] I am he: before me there was * no god formed, neither shall there be after me.

13 Yea, [i] before the day was, I am He; and there is [k] none that can deliver out of my hand: [l] I will work, and who shall † let it?

14 ¶ Thus saith [m] the LORD, your Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel; [n] For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and have brought down all their ‡ nobles, and the Chaldeans, [o] whose cry is in the ships.

15 I am [p] the LORD, your Holy One, [q] the Creator of Israel, your King.

16 Thus saith the LORD, which [r] maketh a way in the sea, and a path in the mighty waters:

17 Which [s] bringeth forth the chariot and horse, the army, and the power; [t] they shall lie down together, they shall not rise: [u] they are extinct, they are quenched as tow.

18 [x] Remember ye not the former things, neither consider the things of old.

19 Behold, [y] I will do a new thing; now it shall spring forth; shall ye not know it? [z] I will even make a way in the wilderness, and [a] rivers in the desert.

20 The [b] beast of the field shall honour me, the dragons and the § owls: because I gave waters in the wilderness, and rivers in the desert, [c] to give drink to my people, [d] my chosen.

predicted. It is undeniable, from the application of the name of Babylon in the New Testament, that the restoration of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity was typical of the deliverance of the Church from antichristian tyranny: and, probably, the destruction of the seat of Antichrist will be followed by the conversion of the Jews; as the taking of Babylon by Cyrus preceded their release from captivity; and that proud city from that time began to decay, till it was "swept with the besom of destruction." 'I will bring 'all the true seed of Israel out of their spiritual captivity, from 'all the corners of the world; so as all that belong to mine 'election, shall in Christ be gathered unto me.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 8—13. All idolaters and opposers of true religion, whether Jews or Gentiles, seem to be here addressed; they do not use their faculties and opportunities as they ought to do, but have eyes and see not, ears and hear not: or the idols whom they stupidly worshipped may be meant. Let all the images and their votaries assemble together, that the cause betwixt God and his rivals might be decided. Let their witnesses be produced to justify their idol-worship: which of them could, like JEHOVAH, previously declare his purposes, and predict what first should come to pass? if none of them could do this, let them hear the word of God, and say that is truth, and that he alone ought to be worshipped. For the Jews were witnesses for God, and so was his servant the prophet, (or as some think, the Messiah,) that he thus predicted future events, and interposed to deliver his people: the whole history of the nation abundantly evidenced these things, and was suited to convince them that JEHOVAH was the only true God. None of the false gods were formed before him, nor could any worthy of that title be ever discovered after him: nay, he alone is the LORD, the self-existent God, and there is no Saviour beside him. When we recollect that Christ repeatedly used the word I am, or I am he, especially when he said "before Abraham was, I AM;" when we consider how frequently he is called Lord and God, that he received the worship of saints and angels, and that he is emphatically the Author of eternal salvation: we shall not doubt, but that he is one with the Father in the unity of the Godhead; otherwise it will not be easy to reconcile those passages in the New Testament with this decided language.—JEHOVAH had declared his purposes, wrought miraculous deliverances for Israel, and showed future events, when there was no strange god among them, to whom the honour could be given: therefore they could testify for him, that he was the omniscient, omnipotent God. But indeed he had been from eternity, and none could deliver out of his hand, or hinder his accomplishing his purposes and predictions.—This challenge would have a peculiar propriety and emphasis, after the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon: but how wonderful will these predictions appear to mankind, when they shall see them accomplished in the conversion of the Jews to God our only Saviour, whom they have so long rejected!

22 ¶ But [f] thou hast not called upon me, O Jacob; but [g] thou hast been weary of me, O Israel.

23 Thou [h] hast not brought me the * small cattle of thy burnt offerings, neither hast thou [i] honoured me with thy sacrifices. I have not caused thee to serve with an offering, nor wearied thee with incense.

24 Thou hast bought me [k] no sweet cane with money, [l] neither hast thou † filled me with the fat of thy sacrifices: but [m] thou hast made me to serve with thy sins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.

25 I, [n] even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions [o] for mine own sake, and [p] will not remember thy sins.

26 Put [q] me in remembrance: let us plead together: [r] declare thou, that thou mayest be justified.

V. 14—21. The deliverance from Babylon is here primarily predicted: but the language soon becomes so elevated and energetic, that it must refer to still greater events. Israel's holy Redeemer, out of love to them, sent the Medes and Persians to take Babylon, and to abase their nobles, (or to destroy the bars of their gates,) and those who gloried and confided in their ships. Babylon was well situated for navigation, till the channel of the Euphrates was purposely obstructed after Cyrus had taken that city.—JEHOVAH had long ago divided the sea, and destroyed the power of Egypt to deliver Israel; but these former deliverances should not be worthy of remembrance, compared with what he was about to do for them. The deliverance from Egypt was, however, attended with far greater wonders, than the reduction of the Jews from Babylon: but the redemption of Christ, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the recall of the Jews into the Church, may well be considered as far more glorious events. The emblems here used have already been explained; (Notes, xxx. 25. xxxv. xli. 17—19.)—'The image is highly poetical. God will give such 'abundant miraculous supplies of water, that the wild 'beasts, &c. which haunt those desert regions, shall break 'forth into thanksgiving.' (Bp. Lowth.)—As the Lord forms believers by his grace to show forth his praise; so the Jewish nation seems to have been constituted on purpose, that he might manifest his justice, power, truth, and mercy, in his dealings with them through every age, to the world.—"This people have I purchased, (or made "peculiarly mine,) that they may show forth my praises." (Sept.) This language so much resembles that of St. Peter, that it is evident he referred to it in these words, "A "peculiar people, that ye should show forth the praises "of him, who hath called you out of darkness into his "marvellous light." (1 Pet. ii. 9, 10. Greek;) and this shows, that true believers are the Israel to whom these promises are especially addressed.

V. 22—25. The Israelites were always disposed to forsake the worship of JEHOVAH, as weary of his service: the lambs, kids, and other cattle which he claimed for sacrifice, were either withheld, or offered in a dishonourable manner. He had not laid on them such injunctions as could injure them: nor would he have insisted on their offerings and incense, if they had not been able to pay them. But instead of expending their wealth in purchasing spices, sweet ointments, and oblations for the house of God, they made his kind providence to subserve their iniquities, and even wearied his patience out by their rebellion. So that all the mercies that they had received, and that complete forgiveness which he revealed and promised, (blotting out their sins as a cancelled debt, and making no more mention of them than if he had quite forgotten them,) must be allowed to be wholly unmerited; the fruit of his abundant grace, for his own glory, and not any thing due to them for their good behaviour, but notwithstanding their aggravated provocations. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26—28. If the Jews could deny this charge, let them remind God of their good works, and plead with him, declaring on what ground they expected to be continued in his special favour, and to be justified before him. But indeed their remote ancestors from Adam to that time, and their high priests, chief rulers, and teachers had combined in transgression: and therefore God had treated them as if they were heathens, notwithstanding their external relation to him and his sanctuary; and had given up the nation as accursed, to be every where reproached, and treated with contempt. 'I have suffered the Babylonians 'to profane the sanctuary, to abuse the chief priests, and 'pollute whatever is sacred.' (Lowth.) Their king, also, the anointed of the Lord, of David's line, might be intended. (Marg. Ref.) The prophecy, however, had its most signal fulfilment in the combination of the high priest, chief priests, scribes, and rulers against Christ; and in the rejected and disgraced state of the nation, with its rulers and teachers, to this day. But as of mere mercy, their national guilt was pardoned, and they were brought back from Babylon; so the Lord, of the same abounding grace, will bring them to repentance and faith in Christ, and glorify himself in blotting out all their transgressions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

grace, and aim to live to his glory; we can have no just cause to fear any thing that can befal ourselves, the Church, or the world. We may meet with hot fires of tribulation and persecution during our pilgrimage: we may pass through deep waters of temptation, and we must cross the Jordan of death: but the Lord will be with us; and no fire can injure, no waters drown us, when he is our Guard, our Upholder, and our Comforter. He hath done far more for us, than when he gave Egypt for the ransom of Israel; for he hath given his Son to be the propitiation for our sins; and though in ourselves we were base and abominable; yet this great ransom of the Holy One of Israel our Saviour hath dignified our species, and shown the value of our souls: and when the grace of the Holy Spirit manifests that we are precious in the sight of the Lord, and the objects of his special love, we are ennobled, enriched, and made honourable, as kings and priests unto him. Nay, when we give up our ambitious projects of acquiring worldly distinction, and are content to bear reproach for his sake; he often leads us to such connexions with the wise and excellent of the earth, as are indeed honourable. Then, whatever endangers the life of our souls shall be removed; and all that can be wanting shall be supplied: for as "He hath not "spared his own Son, but delivered him up for us all: "how shall he not with him freely give us all things?" The most powerful princes and empires are as nothing before God, when compared with his Church. For all true believers are the seed of Israel, the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty; when he calls, they must be given up, and cannot be withheld by the powers of darkness, from coming to him from all the ends of the earth: and he will create them for his glory, to all eternity. Alas, many that are favoured with the word of God, are as blind and deaf as the most stupid idolaters, or their senseless images; and they only use their senses and faculties to ensure their own condemnation! But none will be more justly brought forth to punishment, than the advocates of false religion in preference to divine revelation. Let the whole world assemble, and endeavour to form such a book as the Bible, if they can: let them match the prophecies that are contained in it, and fulfilled from age to age, to authenticate its sacred truths and holy precepts: let them produce their witnesses, and see whether they can be justified at the bar of unprejudiced reason, before they venture on their trial at the tribunal of God. Or if they cannot do this, let them hear his word, acknowledge its truth, and yield obedience to it. Every servant of God is a witness for him, and concurs in the testimony of his prophets and apostles, and in that of his beloved Son: and they all can give such an account of what he hath wrought in them, shown to them, and done for them, as may tend to lead others to know, believe, and understand, his power, truth, and love. He only is the true God and eternal life; he saves his people by himself, and needs no created aid; and the help he sends in answer to their prayers, enables them to testify that he never faileth those that trust in him.

V. 14—28.

As none can deliver the enemies of God out of his hand; so none can hinder him from effecting the deliverance of his friends. It is as easy for him to divide rivers and seas, and to destroy unnumbered legions that obstruct their path, as to quench the fire in tow. But external miracles are as nothing compared with that great work and mystery of godliness, God manifested in the flesh, purchasing the Church with his own blood. These things the angels desire to look down into. And all that remains to be done, to bring the believer to glory, to rescue sinners from the bondage of Satan, and to cause the heathen to rejoice in and glorify God our Saviour, is little, compared with that work of incomprehensible love and power. Let us then bless God for the waters which spring forth for us, in this barren wilderness, and let us endeavour to answer the end of our creation and redemption, by showing forth his praises. But, too many professed Christians love a cheap and easy religion; and are negligent or weary of every duty, and grudge all expense or trouble; nay, they weary God by their iniquities and rebellions. Indeed he may well expostulate with each of us. We allow his service to be perfect freedom; that he hath a right to all we have and are; and that he requires of us nothing, but for our own and each other's profit: yet often we neglect to call upon him, or seem weary of his ordinances; we are scanty in our measure of services as if we grudged him our time; we often grieve his Spirit, and weary out his patience with our relapses into sin, and our ingratitude and folly: so that, from first to last, he blotteth out our transgressions for his own sake, and not because we have any claim to such a benefit. If any man imagine himself an exception to this rule, let him draw near and plead his cause, and declare on what grounds he rests his hope of being justified. Alas! the attempt is desperate: our first father transgressed the covenant, and we all, teachers and rulers, as well as others, have copied his example of rebellion; and if we should all be left under his curse, and to everlasting reproach and misery, we could have nothing to answer or plead in our own behalf. But "where sin hath abounded "grace did much more abound;" yet let none "sin on "that grace may abound:" we have no reason to expect pardon, except we seek it by faith in Christ; and this is always attended by deep repentance, and followed by newness of life, from hatred of sin and love to God our Saviour.

2 Thus saith the LORD [c] that made thee, and [d] formed thee from the womb, which will help thee; [e] Fear not, O Jacob, my servant; and thou [f] Jesurun, whom I have chosen.

7 And [u] who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it, and set it in order for me, [x] since I appointed the ancient people? and the things that are coming, and shall come, let them shew unto them.

8 Fear ye not, [y] neither be afraid: have not I told thee from that time, and [z] have declared it? [a] ye are even my witnesses. [b] Is there a god besides me? yea, there is no * god; I know not any.

9 ¶ They that [c] make a graven image are all of them vanity; [d] and their † delectable things shall not profit; and they are [e] their own witnesses; they see not, nor know; that they may be ashamed.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIV. V. 2. Jesurun. (Note, Deut. xxxii. 15.)

V. 3—5. Water is the emblem of the Holy Spirit: as water refreshes, enlivens, cleanses, and fructifies the earth; so do his influences the soul, which without them would remain destitute of good and of all true consolation. When any descendants of Israel, through revolving ages, thirst for spiritual blessings, this promise is ready in their Scriptures for their direction and encouragement. As a prediction it hath been accomplished as often, as true religion hath been revived: but it seems particularly to predict the pouring out of the Spirit on and after the day of Pentecost; and a still more glorious completion may yet be expected, both in respect of Jews and Gentiles.—When desires are excited and fervent prayers offered, for the pouring out of the Spirit on any place, where the power of godliness has been little experienced, the blessing may be expected, and converts will spring up as grass in well watered meadows, or as willows on the banks of rivers and brooks; and these will dedicate themselves to the Lord, as his servants and worshippers, setting their hands and seals to the new covenant of his grace, and joining themselves to his people to walk in holy fellowship with them. Some think, that the phrase, "subscribe with his hand "unto the LORD," signifies bearing his name, as belonging to him: as soldiers are said to have been marked in the hand with the name of their leader, slaves with that of their owner, and idolaters with that of their idol. (Rev. xiii. 16—18.)

V. 6—8. Israel's Redeemer and King, the everlasting JEHOVAH, and the only true God, here again challenges the idols and their worshippers to call forth, and to declare in order before him, a series of predictions similar to that which he had given and been accomplishing, since he appointed to the ancient inhabitants of the earth their several abodes; and to show the things that should come to pass immediately, or in distant periods. By "the ancient peo-"ple," or the people of eternity, Israel seems to be meant, as the type of the elect, whom "God hath from the be-"ginning chosen unto eternal salvation." 'He chose 'Abraham and his family to be his peculiar people: over 'whom he hath all along exercised a particular providence: 'and hath from time to time foreshowed what should befal 'them, which accordingly has come to pass.' (Lowth.) Indeed a compendious history of that nation from the calling of Abraham to this day, (that is, for three thousand seven hundred years,) might be drawn up, without very material alterations, from the various prophecies concerning them contained in the Scriptures. (Marg. Ref.) As then Israel had such proof, that their God alone could do such wonders, they ought not either to worship idols or to fear idolaters. They were witnesses for God, that he had from ancient times declared the events, which had come to pass: and he appealed to them, whether there were any god besides him, or any other rock, or protector, who could defend them; for He, who knew all things, knew not any. —Let any serious mind compare this decisive language with the tenour of the New Testament concerning Christ; and he will perceive that it is necessary to admit the mystery of distinct persons in the Godhead, in order to reconcile them. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. The subsequent passage contains the most keen reproof of idolatry, and even invective against it, 12 [i] The smith with * the tongs both worketh in the coals, and fashioneth it with hammers, and worketh it with the strength of his arms: [k] yea, he is hungry, and his strength faileth: he drinketh no water, and is faint.

13 The carpenter stretcheth out his rule, [l] he marketh it out with a line; he fitteth it with planes, and he marketh it out with the compass, and maketh it after the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man; [m] that it may remain in the house.

14 He [n] heweth him down cedars, and taketh the cypress and the oak, which he † strengtheneth for himself among the trees of the forest: he planteth an ash, and the rain doth nourish it.

15 Then shall it be for a man to burn: for he will take thereof and warm himself; yea, he kindleth it, and baketh bread; yea, [o] he maketh a god, and worshippeth it; he maketh it a graven image, and falleth down thereto.

16 He burneth part thereof in the fire; with part thereof he eateth flesh; he roasteth roast, and is satisfied: yea, he warmeth himself, and saith, Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire:

17 And the residue thereof he maketh a god, even his graven image: he falleth down unto it, and worshippeth it, and prayeth unto it, and saith, [p] Deliver me; for thou art my god!

18 They [q] have not known nor understood: [r] for he hath ‡ shut their eyes, that they cannot see; and their hearts, that they [s] cannot understand.

that is any where extant. The makers of graven images must be very vanity, when the objects of their supreme confidence and delight were utterly worthless: the very idols sufficiently bare witness to the folly and wickedness of their votaries, as it was evident that they could neither see nor know any thing; and this should have rendered them ashamed of worshipping a lifeless block for a deity. Indeed all concerned in making or worshipping them, would at length be ashamed of their folly. The artists themselves were of Adam, weak dying men; how then could they confer power and divinity on their workmanship? and though they should all gather together to support their cause, they would be intimidated and confounded before the God of Israel. The clause rendered "they are their "own witnesses," may be translated, "they" (that is, the idols, the immediate antecedent,) are "witnesses to "them."

V. 12—17. The process of image-making is here described, in order to expose the folly of idolaters. The smith exhausted his strength, and would not allow himself time for rest or refreshment, in hammering out and fashioning his idol; which after all could not preserve him from fainting, or perishing, by hunger and thirst. The carpenter, in his way too, employed his strength and skill in forming an idol of wood, to set up in his house as the object of his adoration; though it was as senseless as the meanest part of his furniture, and far more useless. In order to be prepared to serve his neighbours with this strange manufacture, he provided a large stock of several kinds of timber, selecting that which grew most strong and straight; and even planting ash-trees, and waiting their growth, for this purpose. And when the boughs and chips, &c. had been used for fuel; he was so stupid, as to make his deity of the same log, to prostrate himself before it, and to pray unto it, saying, "Deliver me, for thou art my god!" That which warmed him and cooked his food, though the refuse, was useful; but that which made the image was good for nothing, nay, an abomination. We are not to conclude that all the idolaters were so stupid, as to terminate their adoration upon the lifeless image; for some of the heathen poets acutely derided the folly of those that did so. Yet the practice naturally led the unthinking multitude to adore the idol itself. And the invisible object, which a few conceived to be present with it and to be represented by it, was commonly as much the creature of their imagination, as the other was the work of their hands. In every way God was dishonoured and robbed of his worship, and Satan was gratified as the object of their adoration. The history of popery shows, that similar effects have uniformly followed from the use of images; whether as representing the saints and angels which the people invoke as mediators, or as representing the persons in the sacred Trinity. Horace ludicrously puts these words into the mouth of an image: 'I was of old the trunk of a 'fig-tree, a block of useless wood: when the carpenter, 'uncertain whether to make a bench or a Priapus, chose 'that I should be a god!' 'When therefore does it be-'come a god? Behold it is cast, fashioned, and carved!— 'It is not yet a god. It is soldered, put together, and set 'up! Neither is it yet a god.—Behold, it is adorned, con-'secrated, and prayed to! then at length it is a god, when 'men have chosen and dedicated it.' (Minutius Felix.)

V. 18. The effect is here mentioned, but the agent is not assigned; for it might be rendered, "Their eyes are "shut," &c. Satan blinds the minds of unbelievers by means of their corrupt passions, especially their enmity to the holy perfections, truth, and worship of God: and his agency is the grand cause of that absurdity, and of those sentiments and practices disparaging to the human understanding, of which the most sensible men are capable in matters of religion. But he only acts as permitted by God, who gives up obstinate transgressors to judicial blindness and obduracy, that they cannot see nor understand. 'God 'hath, in his just judgment, given them up to a strange 'besottedness,—so as though they have both hearts and 'eyes, they cannot understand.' (Bp. Hall.)

V. 20. Ashes would not only be nauseous and destitute of nutriment, if eaten as bread, but very prejudicial: thus idolatry, used as religion for the sustenance of the soul, is not only useless, but ruinous; and whether men seek happiness in worldly things, or run into infidelity, superstition, pharisaism, enthusiasm, or any false system of religion, the case is similar; as they seek support to their souls from that which indeed will prove the cause of their destruction. A heart, deceived by pride, love of sin, and alienation from God, turns men thus aside from him: and whilst the affections are depraved, a man cannot detect his own error, nor deliver his own soul; but he holds the lie fast in his right hand, as his peculiar treasure.

V. 22. God had repeatedly pardoned the sins of Israel. When their transgressions impended over them, as a threatening storm, apparently about to burst in vengeance on their heads, he had scattered them as the wind disperses the black clouds: and therefore they should be encouraged to return to him as their Redeemer. This seems especially to refer to the case of the Jews, during the captivity, and in their present dispersion; and it implies a promise of pardon and deliverance, as well as an exhortation to repentance. In that redemption, of which the deliverances of Israel were types, provision is made for the free pardon of all that believe; and the proclamation of this by the Gospel excites and encourages sinners to return to God. But it would be absurd to argue from the arrangement of a single sentence, contrary to the whole tenour of Scripture, that forgiveness precedes repentance.

V. 23. 'An apostrophe to the whole creation, to join 'in praising God for his wonderful mercies; which shows 'that they are such, as all the world are some way con-'cerned in: and such only are the mercies of the Gospel, 'for which the earth ought to rejoice; because the benefits 'are extended to all mankind; and the angels in heaven 'will sympathize with men below, because they joy in 'the conversion and salvation of mankind, and in their 'being reunited to that blessed society, of which Christ is 'the Head.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 24. By myself. The apostle says that "God created "all things by JESUS CHRIST," "By whom also he made "the worlds:" For "He and the Father are one."

V. 25—28. The God of Israel had often confounded the magicians and wise counsellors of his enemies: and in this case he determined to frustrate the expectations of all the Chaldean soothsayers and diviners; to prove them liars, and absolutely to infatuate them. He would expose the folly of all their wise men, when they could not read the hand-writing to Belshazzar, nor detect Cyrus' device to take Babylon: and he would equally shame the politicians, when it was proved that they had used no suitable or effectual means of defence against the besiegers. At the same time he confirmed the word of his servant Isaiah, and performed every thing according to the information given by his messengers, the prophets, in bringing these events to pass. When this prophecy was delivered, Jerusalem and Judah were inhabited and at peace. But it was intimated that the city and temple would be destroyed to the foundations; (this took place about a hundred and twenty years afterwards;) and that they should be rebuilt by orders from Cyrus, which happened about a hundred and seventy years after. Cyrus, (who is the only man, except Josiah,

CHAP. XLV.

God promises Cyrus success, that he might liberate the Jews; declares his eternal Deity, as the Creator of all things; promises glorious success to his church, and rebukes those that quarrelled with his appointments, 1—14. The prophet adores his deep counsels, pronounces the confusion of idolaters, and assures Israel of salvation, 15—20. JEHOVAH reveals himself as a just God and a Saviour; and swears by himself, that all should bow to him, and that Israel should be justified and glory in him, 21—25.

that was predicted by name much above a hundred years before his birth,) was appointed to act as shepherd over the Lord's scattered flock. The promise that Jerusalem should be inhabited was to be fulfilled, by Cyrus giving orders for its being rebuilt, and the foundations of the temple laid: and the foundations were indeed laid in his time, but it was not built till some time afterwards! The manner in which Babylon was taken was also foretold: the wide and deep river Euphrates, which ran through the city, was emptied into a vast lake prepared to receive its superfluous waters, and Cyrus marched his army into the city by the channel of the river.—Probably this prophecy, shown by Daniel to Cyrus, hastened the deliverance of the Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

When the greater part of any Church is become totally corrupt and ripe for divine vengeance, there may yet be a few of another character: warnings and calamities may bring a remnant to repentance; and encouragement must be given to them. For however the Lord may deal with atrocious offenders; he will always have a company of chosen servants, that will hear his call and obey his voice. Having formed them to be upright in heart, he unites towards them the love of a Creator and a Redeemer; and he would have them discard those dejecting fears, which are often excited by his denunciations of wrath against hypocrites. Whithersoever his providence may lead them, his grace shall refresh their thirsty souls, and cause them to flourish as a watered garden. The blessed influences of the Spirit render the barren desert and the dry ground a fruitful field. May our souls, our families, our congregations, our land, and all the nations of the earth be abundantly replenished with it! Then shall we abound in the fruits of righteousness; and believers will be daily added to the Lord.—He is ever ready to receive the sinner to mercy, and into his service; and nothing can hinder our being his people, and he our God, except our own proud and carnal unwillingness. But when his Spirit is poured out upon any congregation, that was before formal and lifeless; one and another continually springs up and comes forth, to profess his acceptance of the Saviour and subjection to him; this tends to enliven others, and a blessed change is soon perceived.—It behooves those who have learned to hope in the Lord's mercy, and to love his pleasant ways, to make an open profession of their faith and intended devotedness to his service; solemnly to ratify the new covenant of his grace, and to avow their purpose of cleaving to him steadfastly; to join themselves to his people; to put themselves under the care of such as watch for their souls, and to seek the benefit of brotherly inspection and admonition. The Lord's supper, when properly administered and received, is suited to answer these ends: and new converts should not be slack in thus "subscribing with "their hands unto the Lord, and surnaming themselves by "the name of Israel."

V. 6—20.

Who can pretend to compare with Israel's Redeemer and King? He is the First and the Last; He alone calls, and declares, and appoints, and orders every thing with absolute authority: his majesty and mercy are alike unrivalled: and besides him, none is entitled to our worship, or deserving of our confidence.—As God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, sinners may be happy in his favour, rich in his bounty, and safe under his protection: but Satan so blinds the hearts of men, that they generally neglect and despise these blessings, for the sake of some stupid idolatry or vile iniquity.—We may well be amazed at the absurdity of those unnumbered millions, that have worshipped wood and stone, the work of men's hands, to the disgrace of their reason and understanding. Yet we should also be humbled; as we are equally capable of the same folly, though the blessed light of revelation have preserved us from the grosser effects of this propensity. But what multitudes are there even among us, whose characters and lives are vanity; whose delectable things cannot profit; and whose grovelling pursuits, polluting pleasures, and childish amusements, bear witness against them, and should cover them with shame! What numbers, whose religious principles and observances can no more abide scrutiny, or stand the test of Scripture, or common sense, than those of the poor Pagans! The object of their worship is an imaginary being; and they think of God, and behave towards him, as if he were altogether such an one as themselves: nay, they expect him to reward such services with eternal felicity, as they would disdain, if imitated by any of their domestics; a mere lip-labour, slovenly performed, belying the sentiments, and covering the enmity, of their hearts!—But sometimes men will even weary and deny themselves more in a false religion, than would be necessary in the service of God. Many of us can remember a time, when we more abridged ourselves of rest and refreshment, in following our own humours; than we now willingly do for the glory of God, and in attending on his ordinances. Indeed the earnestness, assiduity, perseverance, and self-denial of worldly or superstitious men, may put believers to shame; when they consider how far they are surpassed by those who act from such inferior motives and for such worthless acquisitions. The absurdity and madness of man can never be accounted for; except we consider the power of Satan to shut his eyes and his heart, that he cannot know nor understand; and recollect that the Lord often sends men "strong delu-"sions to believe a lie," because they hate the truth through love of sin. In this way they are brought "to feed upon "ashes:" their deceived hearts turn them aside from truth and holiness: and they are so fettered by their lusts, that they cannot deliver their souls, nor discover that they are holding fast a lie in their right hand. It is awful to think how many are in this situation: they make an evident error their first principle of activity; and will neither be convinced nor persuaded to doubt of the truth of their favourite mistake; they cling to it most closely when most alarmed, and grasp it fast in the hour of death, and go into eternity with it in their right hand. Oh may we remember these things, and take care not to provoke God, by sinning in defiance of conviction, to give us up to be thus blinded and deceived! Let us pray for the illuminating and renewing influences of his Holy Spirit, that we may be formed to be his servants: then he will secure us from such delusion, and we shall never be forgotten of him.

V. 21—28.

Our manifold transgressions were risen into a thick and black cloud, and vengeance was about to burst on our heads: but the sacrifice of Christ hath caused this cloud to vanish, and we are now called and commanded to return to him, for that he hath redeemed us. Let us then obey the gracious call, and avail ourselves of this abundant mercy; that we may join the songs of the inhabitants of heaven and earth, in praising the Lord, that he hath done this, and hath glorified himself in the redemption of his people. How should we exult at the thought, that he "who "stretched forth the heavens alone, and spread abroad the "earth by himself," is become our gracious Redeemer! He will confound the wisdom of the wise, and turn them backward, and make their knowledge foolish; and above all, he will put to shame false teachers and deceivers, whom Satan employs to support idolatry, impiety, infidelity, or false religion. But he will confirm the word and approve the counsel of his faithful ministers: and when his promises and threatenings shall be completely performed, they who now despise his servants, will then perceive their wisdom and happiness.—He, that knoweth the end from the beginning, hath given commandment to replenish Jerusalem, to erect his spiritual temple, and to repair the decayed places of his Church. A nobler Shepherd than Cyrus is commissioned to gather together his scattered flock, and to feed and protect them in his fold; and he will do all the Father's pleasure, till his work be fully completed. As he hath removed obstacles, and raised up instruments to fulfil former prophecies: so will he do in respect to all that yet remain to be accomplished; until the top stone of his temple be brought forth, "with shoutings, crying "grace, grace, unto it."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLV. V. 1—6. The Lord here addressed Cyrus as if present; he was the anointed of God, as he was set apart for this work, and as he was a type of Christ our Redeemer. Cyrus, being holden by the right hand, and strengthened by the Lord, would certainly be victorious. JEHOVAH subdued many other nations before him, previously to his conquest of Babylon: and he degraded or enfeebled many kings by him: Belshazzar especially was thus intimidated before he was destroyed. (Marg. Ref.) All the streets of Babylon, that led down on each side to the river, were secured by two-leaved brazen gates, which used to be shut every night: and when Cyrus marched his army into the channel of the river, he could not, without great danger and difficulty, have taken the city, had not the Babylonians, (engaged that night in feasting and mirth, and despising his efforts,) left these gates open. Thus God opened before him the two-leaved gates; or what was equivalent, he took care that they should not be shut: and so he met with no hinderance, till he surprised the king in his palace, and by his death ended the contest at once. Indeed the Lord went before him, through his whole expedition, to remove every obstacle to his success: he broke before him the gates of brass and bars of iron, which obstructed his entrance into the various cities that he besieged; and he gave him immense treasures, that had long been deposited in dark and secret places, so that his spoil is said to have amounted to above a hundred and twenty millions sterling.—The exact fulfilment of these prophecies was intended to convince Cyrus, that the God of Israel, who had called him by name, surnamed him his shepherd and his anointed, and girded him with strength, when he was an entire stranger to him, was indeed the only true God. (Ezra i. 2.) This was for the sake of Israel, his chosen servant, and in order to effect their release, and to make known to the most distant regions, that there was no other God but JEHOVAH.—The word mystery seems to have been derived from mystarium, here rendered secret places.

V. 7. The Magians, whose religion chiefly prevailed in the east, held, that there were two co-eternal, co-ordinate beings, of whom they thought the light and darkness to be proper emblems, the one the author of all good, the other of all evil: that these were continually opposing each other: and that from this contest, that mixture and interchange of good and evil, which prevails on earth, originated. This was indeed a very absurd opinion; yet it was a natural conclusion from a careful observation of the state of the world, by those who were unacquainted with the cause and the cure of the evils, which abound on every side. But in opposition to this opinion, JEHOVAH here declared, both light and darkness, good and evil, to be his creatures: that is, there is no being in the universe independent of him; all are his creatures and instruments, either acting at his command or by his permission. He is positively the author of all that is true, holy, good, or happy in the universe: and evil, error, and misery came into the world by his permission, through the wilful apostacy of his creatures; but are so restrained and over-ruled by him, as to subserve his wise and righteous purposes: and cannot possibly exceed the bounds that he assigns them, or defeat any of his plans, nor create him any disquietude or disappointment.

V. 8. It has before been observed, that spiritual blessings are often predicted under the veil of temporal deliverances; and that in this case, sometimes the external sign is more immediately intended, and sometimes the thing signified. In the preceding verses the deliverance from Babylon was immediately predicted; but in this verse, and in the remainder of this chapter, the blessings of salvation are chiefly intended. At the word of JEHOVAH, the great first cause of all, the heavens would drop from above, yea, pour down plenteous showers of righteousness, to water and fructify the earth: and the earth would open to receive the gracious showers, and would in consequence yield an abundant increase of salvation and righteousness. (Ps. lxxxv. 9—12.) Some partial fulfilment of this took place in the revival of true religion, which attended the return of the Jews from Babylon: but the redemption of sinners by the incarnate Son of God, and the pouring out of the Spirit to give success to the Gospel, must principally be intended. When the eternal Son came down from heaven to save sinners, the heavens dropped down righteousness; and the earth, where he took his human nature in which he magnified the law, satisfied justice, and finished his work, brought forth salvation. When, after his exaltation in heaven, the Holy Spirit was poured out, and by his influence numbers of sinners were converted, sayed, and made fruitful in all good works; then the skies poured down righteousness, the earth received the blessed communication, and brought forth salvation and righteousness together: and the whole was the work of the wisdom, power, holiness, truth, and mercy of God our Creator.—'Justice and salvation, mercy and truth, righteousness and 'peace and glory, dwelling in the land, cannot with any 'sort of propriety, be interpreted as the consequences 'of that event, (the return of the Jews from Babylon;) 'they must mean the blessings of the great redemption 'by the Messiah.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 9, 10. This seems to be more immediately addressed to those Jews, that quarrelled with the divine conduct; as if they would accuse God of injustice, unfaithfulness, or unkindness. But by this they could only bring ruin on themselves. Whilst men contend with each other, they are equally matched; and like potsherds dashed one against the other, they break and are broken in their turn: but they cannot hope to obtain so much as a temporary advantage in contending with the Almighty; either by rebelling against his authority, or disputing against his appointments. Such a conduct is as absurd, as if the clay should quarrel with the shape into which the potter had thought good to form it: or as if any work should charge the maker with want of skill, averring that he had no hands, or else he would have made it otherwise. It is as ungrateful and foolish, as if a child should revile his parents, because his shape is not more comely, or his constitution more vigorous, or that he is not of an angelic nature. But it is especially perverse and presumptuous for men to arraign the dispensations of God; because the whole is the result of infinite wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. (Rom. ix. 19—21.)

V. 11. Ask, &c. Or, "Do ye ask me," &c.? Do ye question me, or call me to account, concerning my future dealings with my children; and give me orders how I am to behave in my own creation! The verse seems to be an application of those which go before, and a reprimand of those Jews who disputed against the prophecies respecting them. They supposed themselves to be exclusively the children of God, and to have a special right to his peculiar favour which could not be forfeited: yet He 12 I have [h] made the earth, and created man upon it: I, even [i] my hands, have stretched out the heavens, and [k] all their host have I commanded.

13 I have [l] raised him up [m] in righteousness, and I will * direct all his ways: [n] he shall build my city, and he shall [o] let go my captives, not for [p] price nor reward, saith the LORD of hosts.

14 Thus saith the LORD, [q] The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia, and of [r] the Sabeans, [s] men of stature, shall come over unto thee, and they shall be thine: they shall come after thee; [t] in chains they shall come over, and [u] they shall fall down unto thee; they shall make supplication unto thee, saying, [x] Surely God is in thee: [y] and there is none else, there is no god.

15 Verily thou art [z] a God that hidest thyself, [a] O God of Israel, the Saviour.

16 They shall be [b] ashamed, and also confounded, all of them: they shall go to confusion together that are makers of idols.

17 But [c] Israel shall be saved in the LORD with [d] an everlasting salvation: [e] ye shall not be ashamed, nor confounded world without end.

had given intimations, that he would severely punish them, nay, cast them off and call the Gentiles into his Church: and this excited their murmurs and presumptuous inquiries and objections. Some, however, take the words in quite a different sense, especially induced by the introduction, "Thus saith the Holy One of Israel and his Maker," which generally ushers in a gracious promise. 'Instead 'of murmuring, humble yourselves; and ask what ye will 'for the consolation of my children; and ye shall be sure of 'it, as ye are of those things which are at your command-'ment.' 'Although God be not obliged to render an ac-'count of his proceedings; yet he is graciously pleased to 'resolve any questions that are proposed to him, con-'cerning the issue of his people's captivity. Nay, he re-'presents himself as ready to serve them, and to do every 'thing that can be desired in favour of his elect, those 'whom he calls here his sons and the work of his hands.' (Lowth.) The word command, in such a connexion, is, I think, found no where else in Scripture: and neither of the verbs are imperative.

V. 12, 13. By the same power which had created the heavens and the earth, and for the most righteous purposes of judgment on the Chaldeans, of truth to his people, and of promoting true religion, the Lord had raised Cyrus to his eminent station and great power: and he would direct and prosper him in all his ways; in order that he might rebuild Jerusalem and liberate the captive Jews, without price or reward, to which he would influence his mind, though contrary to the political maxims adopted by princes in general. 'Cyrus only gave order for the building of the 'temple: but the consequence of that would be the re-'building of the city, as being the Metropolis of the king-'dom, and the place to which the whole nation were to 'repair at their solemn feasts.' (Lowth.)

V. 14. When these prophecies were performed, many Egyptians, Ethiopians, and Sabeans, (who were noted for their height of stature,) would be proselyted, and present their riches as oblations at the temple: and being thus subdued and led captive, they would submissively desire admission into the Church, convinced that God was in the midst of her; and that there was no other god, no other object of worship, save the God of Israel. But the conversion and subjection of the Gentiles to Christ are also predicted: by which the most renowned, powerful, and wealthy nations of the earth, renouncing all their idols, become the worshippers of the God of the formerly despised Israelites: and thus are attached to them in the closest bonds, and give them the greatest honour imaginable, by acknowledging that they alone are the people of God, and by supplicating to be incorporated among them, that they may share their privileges. 'The words may be 'supposed in some degree verified, in Cyrus' devoting the 'tribute coming out of those rich provinces, to the build-'ing and service of God's temple. I conceive the place 'is principally meant of the Church, when the Gentile 'world should come into it, as the only seat and tem-'ple of truth.' (Lowth.)

V. 15—17. Truly the God and Saviour of Israel hides himself and his gracious counsels and designs, under an impenetrable veil; so that it cannot be known what his intentions are, until the event declare them: seeing the Babylonish captivity, and other most calamitous dispensations, were designed to make way for the enlargement of the Church, and the increase of her purity and honour. It should therefore at length appear, that all idolaters would be confounded together, and all the true Israel of God be saved with an everlasting salvation, by means of their union with the everlasting JEHOVAH; and that they would never be ashamed of their confidence, through all generations and to all eternity. 'The reader cannot but observe 'the sudden transition from the solemn adoration of the 'secret and mysterious nature of God's counsels, in regard 'of his people, to the spirited denunciation of the con-'fusion of idolaters, and the final destruction of idolatry, 'contrasted with the salvation of Israel, not from tem-'poral captivity, but the eternal salvation of the Messiah, 'strongly marked by the repetition and augmentation of 'the phrase, to the ages of eternity.' (Bp. Lowth.) Israel must here mean the whole body of believers, as 'in 'CHRIST JESUS, who of God is made to them wisdom, 'righteousness, sanctification, and redemption.' (Marg. Ref. John xiv. 20.)

V. 18, 19. The Lord did not form the heavens or the earth in vain, but in order to be occupied by their respective inhabitants: and in like manner none of his works are wrought in vain. He had not chosen Israel merely to cast him off again: he hath not formed and accomplished his plan of redemption, without a purpose of replenishing his Church with converts, and his heavenly mansions with inhabitants: he did not intend that Judah and Jerusalem should always continue desolate. And as he hath almighty power, he can effectually ensure his purposes, and perform his predictions. These were not spoken in secret; (as the heathen oracles were uttered from some dark cavern or retired recess, and in ambiguous language which shrunk from investigation:) but they were open for every one to read, and obvious to every understanding. Nor ought it to be inferred from the miseries about to come on the Jewish nation, that God had commanded his people to seek him in vain, as the idolaters called on their idols to no purpose; for no Israelites ever walked in the steps of their believing progenitors, who failed of obtaining the covenanted blessings. Indeed, however men may object, the Lord speaks righteousness, and gives sentence according to truth and equity; and his promises, decrees, threatenings, and judgments are entirely consistent; as it will appear at the day of judgment.

V. 20—22. JEHOVAH here addressed himself to the Gentiles, and he exhorted those of the several nations, that had escaped his judgments and the sword of Cyrus, to draw near unto him; that they might be instructed, and convinced of the folly and wickedness of praying to idols, which could not save them. They were required to tell one another of these events, to draw near to examine the predictions and their accomplishment; and to consult together, whether JEHOVAH alone had not declared these things from ancient times: that they might be convinced that there was no God besides him; a just Avenger of his enemies and rebellious subjects, and a merciful and powerful Saviour of those who trust in and serve him: that so they might be induced to renounce their idolatry and iniquity, and to depend on him for salvation, from the remotest regions of the earth. As in Christ Jesus and his mediatory work, the justice and mercy of JEHOVAH harmonize, and he appears to be "a just God and a Saviour;" as all the nations of the earth are invited, and commanded to look unto Jesus, Immanuel, that they may be saved; and as there are evident references of the subsequent verses to Christ in the New Testament: so we cannot be mistaken in considering the eternal Son as speaking in this passage; who, with the Father and Holy Spirit, is our God and Saviour, and there is none beside.

V. 23—25. JEHOVAH here solemnly swears by himself, that he will irrevocably perform the righteous and faithful word, which he had spoken; that every knee shall bow in adoration and submission to him; and that every tongue shall confess his name, and vow allegiance to him. "Surely," shall each of them say, "In JEHOVAH have I "righteousness and strength;" declaring all their righteousness to be in Christ, the LORD our righteousness; all their holy dispositions and righteous actions to spring from his sanctifying grace; and all their safety, support, inward strength, and outward protection, to be only in and from him. To him, JEHOVAH Jesus, men shall come from every nation for these blessings; all that are enraged at the honour paid to him and that hate his cause, shall be put to shame; and all believers, the true seed of Israel, shall be accounted righteous, as one with him; and shall glory and rejoice in him, as their whole Salvation, their Friend and Portion; as made of God the Father unto them, "wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." (1 Cor. i. 30, 31. Phil. ii. 9—11.) The passage seems immediately to predict the establishment of the divine Redeemer's kingdom on earth, the destruction of all implacable enemies to him from among men, and the most universal subjection to the Gospel, through all nations. But

CHAP. XLVI.

The idols of Babylon could not preserve themselves from captivity, 1, 2. The powerful care of God over his people, even to the end, 3, 4. Idols, made with great expense, not to be compared with God, who declares his purposes before he executeth them, especially the deliverance of the Jews by Cyrus, 5—11. The stout hearted far from righteousness, but salvation near to Israel, 12, 13.

St. Paul also applies it to the future judgment; (Rom. xiv. 9—12;) when every man must give an account of himself to God, by appearing before the tribunal of Christ. Then all will allow his right to be their King and Judge; his enemies will be put to shame and perish; his people shall be declared righteous, and shall glory in him as their God and Saviour for ever. Bishop Lowth translates the words, rendered in our version "a just God and a Saviour," 'A 'God that uttereth truth, and granteth salvation.' Yet he assigns no reason for deviating so materially from the literal, general, and almost universal, meaning of the words, "A "just God and a Saviour." A God, infinite in justice and infinite in mercy, is the God of revelation, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; and by this especially he is distinguished, not only from the idols of the heathen, but also from the imaginary supreme being of infidel philosophers of every description. It may be questioned whether the word tzaddik ever signifies simply uttereth truth; though it sometimes means faithfulness, or performing engagements, which were originally entered into of free grace: for the fulfilling of an engagement is an act of justice, whatever induced the person to make it; and justice seems ultimately in all cases the meaning of the original word.—'Here God confirms by an oath the truth of what was fore-'told in the twenty second verse; and the time should cer-'tainly come, when all the world shall give glory to him, 'by paying him solemn worship—and by swearing or pro-'fessing allegiance to him.——What the prophet speaks 'in the person of God is applied by St. Paul to Christ, 'that is, to the second person of the blessed Trinity.—— 'Many more such instances might be given; and all of 'them are plain proofs of the divinity of Christ; and that 'the prophets of the Old Testament had all along an eye 'to the times of the New, and spoke of the Messiah as 'God.—This likewise, (24,) is very applicable to Christ, 'who is called "the LORD our Righteousness," and is 'made unto us Righteousness.—To be justified is a term 'taken from the forms of law, and signifies to be acquitted, 'or pronounced innocent, and come off victorious in a 'cause.' (Lowth.)—It seems indeed, in the Scripture, to mean still more; namely, to be accounted and dealt with not only as innocent, which only exempts from punishment; but as righteous, and entitled to the reward of righteousness.—Adam was innocent, on the day of his creation; but he never attained to righteousness, that is, in himself, because he did not fulfil the commands of God, during the probation allotted him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

The Lord disposes as he pleases of the authority, wealth, and honour of the world; he gives every man that capacity and success that he sees good; and he assigns to each his part in the execution of his vast, his universal plan. He frequently employs such as know him not, to accomplish those ends which require extensive dominion, and are attended with great bloodshed: for he knows that obscure situations are more advantageous to the souls, and peaceful employments more agreeable to the minds, of his true people. The Lord does all things for the elect's sake, and to promote their comfort and salvation: and we should improve our talents for the same purpose. It is the express design of the prophecies, which are fulfilling from age to age by those who know not God, to attract the attention of men, from the rising to the setting of the sun, to inquire after the Lord, by whose inspiration the Bible was penned: we should therefore study them, mark their accomplishment, and point them out to others for the same important ends. Whether peace and prosperity, or evil and adversity, be allotted us, we should recollect that the Lord creates all these things, that all creatures are his instruments, and that nothing can exceed the limits that he assigns them. From God, the Father of lights, cometh every good and perfect gift; and even the evil that he permits, is over-ruled for greater good to all his faithful servants, and to the greater glory of his name. But, whilst we submit to his will in those troubles, which come upon us through the wickedness of men; and give him the glory of all the good that is wrought in us or done by us: let us take all the blame of our sins unto ourselves; for "God "cannot be tempted of evil, neither tempteth he any man." Let us turn his promises into prayers, and beseech him, that the heavens may pour down righteousness and grace upon the earth, rendering it exceedingly fruitful; and that salvation, with all its sanctifying effects may spring forth and abound in every land; that our God in all things may be glorified. We should carefully watch over ourselves, and repress any risings of our hearts against the Lord's decrees, dispensations, and precepts. It is madness in the extreme for us frail creatures to contend with the Almighty, whilst we see such numbers perish by their contests with mortals like themselves! JEHOVAH disdains and abhors our impotent arrogance and perverseness, when we dare to object to his sovereign appointments. It is our wisdom to reverence the depths that we cannot fathom, and to silence our presumption by considering our own ignorance and weakness, and his infinite perfections; and by taking it for granted, that the Judge of all the earth will do right. We may inquire of the Holy One of Israel, concerning the things that he freely giveth to his children, and of what he requireth of his creatures; and we may ask what we will of him in humble prayer, and he will do it for us if it be for our good. But it is intolerable insolence in any man, to demand an account of the Lord's dealings, as if he had authority to interfere, and give orders to him how he ought to dispose of his own works. Yet nothing is more common, than objections and decisions, that imply this horrid blasphemy. But let us endeavour to get acquainted with our own character and place; and to wait the performance of the Lord's promises, in the way of his precepts; and in due time he will answer all objections, and clear up all difficulties.—Our offended Creator, when he might have left us captives to sin and Satan, to whom we were sold for our crimes, hath raised up a mighty Redeemer for us, even his own Son; who, having satisfied the divine justice with the sacrifice of himself, sets the souls of believers at liberty, without price or reward, and makes them citizens of that holy city, which he hath builded for his own eternal residence. As this greatest of all promises hath already been accomplished, we may be assured that all the rest shall be in due season. He will bring all the potent and mighty nations of the earth to join themselves to his despised people, and make them heirs in Christ Jesus; and they shall all know, that God honours and dwells in his Church, and that none else can bless them. Many have thus yielded themselves to Christ and to his people, and have supplicated admission to their communion and privileges; others will continue to come into them, till they have gained the entire ascendency: and, all that truly join themselves to the Lord and his people, are constrained by love, to devote their labour and substance to promote his honour and cause, and to count his service perfect freedom.

V. 15—25.

Our divine Saviour often hides his tender compassions behind frowning dispensations; and requires us to walk by faith, and to give him credit for his wisdom, justice, truth, and mercy, when we cannot see them; for "what he "doeth we know not now, but we shall know hereafter." If then he hides his face from us, let us humbly wait for him: for whilst the most prosperous sinners and self-confident hypocrites will soon go into confusion together; they that trust in the Lord, and partake of his grace, shall be saved in and by him with an everlasting salvation, and shall not be ashamed or confounded for ever. Neither his works nor his word are in vain: as he created the world to be inhabited: so he gave Israel his oracles that they should be proclaimed, and his promises that they should be believed. He would not have this light put in a secret or dark place, but diffused far and wide; and he never said to the seed of wrestling Jacob and prevailing Israel, that they should seek his face in vain. For the Lord speaks in truth and righteousness: and though to our proud carnal hearts, his words appear obscure: yet they are all plain to the humble soul, as well as sincere and to be entirely depended on. Let sinners then renounce their iniquities and superstitions, and cease to pray to mediators or idols that cannot save: and let them with one consent draw near to him, who is a just God and a Saviour, and who glorifies his righteousness in pardoning the vilest transgressors, that rely on the merits of Jesus Christ. He, that once was lifted up on the cross, now calls from his glorious throne, and bids all the ends of the earth look to him for salvation: He is the true God and eternal life; and besides him, there is no other able to save from the wrath to come. In one way or other all must come before him, and submit unto him: for he hath irrevocably confirmed it with an oath, that every knee shall bow, and every tongue shall swear unto him. As we then must all appear before his judgment-seat; and all his virulent enemies, yea, all that will not have him to reign over them, must be covered with shame and confusion: may we now come to him as the Lord our Righteousness, and trust in him for acceptance, sanctification, and victory over every enemy; that we may here be justified and rejoice in his salvation, and walk worthy of it; and at last be "pre-"sented faultless before the presence of his glory with ex-"ceeding joy."

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVI. V. 1, 2. Bel, a contraction probably of Baal, and Nebo, were the two principal idols of Babylon. When that city was taken by the Persians, they were seized on by the victors, and broken down: for the Persians were generally Magians, who did not worship idols, but the sun under the symbol of fire. They would therefore load their beasts and cattle with the metals of which the images were formed, and carry them into captivity. When the Philistines took the ark of God, it became a burden to them, and they were glad to send it back: but the idols of Babylon would only prove a burden to the weary beasts that carried them away; as they could neither deliver themselves, nor those that had the charge of them: as the word rendered burden seems to mean.—"Their "soul;" (Marg.) 'He derideth their idols, which had 'neither soul nor sense.'

V. 3, 4. The continued care, which the Lord had shown towards Israel, and all his powerful works in their behalf, are here contrasted with the impotency of the gods of Babylon. The latter had been carried off by the weary beasts: the former had always carried Israel, in the arms of his love and power, as the nurse carries and tends the new-born infant. JEHOVAH had done this from the time when they were called out of Egypt, which was as the birth of their Church and nation, to their deliverance from Babylon, when become, as it were, helpless through old age. And thus he would always do, whilst they continued his people.

V. 5—9. The Jews were always prone to make images representing God, as well as to worship the idols of other nations. But He called their attention to the expense to which the idolaters put themselves, in making a lifeless image, that was only a trouble and burden to them. It was rather a likeness of a dead corpse, than of the living God: when they had with much labour fixed it in its place, they would be sure to find it there, except it should happen to be thrown down or stolen: for it could not move itself; and therefore it was not able to answer their prayers, or deliver them out of their trouble. Let then the Jews remember these things, and show themselves men, acting like reasonable creatures, and avoiding such an absurd abomination. Let those, that had thus apostatized, review their conduct and retract their error; considering the former works of God to his people, by which he showed himself exclusively entitled to their adoration.—Some think, that the folly of idolaters is thus repeatedly exposed, to prevent the captive Jews in Babylon from conforming to the idolatry of their conquerors: and indeed they seem to have kept far more free from that crime, when living among idolaters, than they had done in their own land.

V. 10, 11. From the beginning of the world God had declared what would come to pass to the end of time; (Note, Gen. iii. 15;) and from ancient times he had predicted the things, that were not then accomplished. And as he had declared his determinations, so no power in the universe could defeat them; but "his counsel should stand, "and he would do all his pleasure:" especially he would call Cyrus, like an eagle or bird of prey, from a far country to execute his purpose of delivering the Jews.—The standard of Cyrus was a golden eagle, and the rapidity of his conquests answered to the emblem.—Bishop Lowth translates the clause "far from righteousness," 'far from de-'liverance:' but this greatly obscures the meaning of the text; and it may be questioned, whether the word be ever used in that sense. It is a substantive from the same root, with that adjective, which he renders speaking truth, in the clause, (as it stands in our version,) "A just God and "a Saviour." (Note xlv. 20—22.)

V. 12, 13. Obstinate, presumptuous, and impenitent sinners, both of the Jews and Gentiles, were here addressed. Such were far from both the righteousness of the law, and that of faith; yet they were summoned to hearken to the word of the Lord. He would speedily perform his righteous engagements to his people, execute his just vengeance on his enemies, and establish his righteousness in the earth. He would deliver the Jews from Babylon, again make Zion his peculiar residence, and there reveal his salvation: and there it should be stationed for the benefit of Israel, in whom he gloried, and in and by whom he would be glorified.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The things from which ungodly men expect safety and happiness, will soon be torn from them, and be incapable of saving them from death and hell; even at present they occasion much more trouble than comfort; and they commonly become an incumbrance and a snare to those, to whom they afterwards devolve. But happy is the man, that trusts in God, and expects felicity from him! As his providence seems especially to watch over the helpless infant, and those that are decrepid through age; so his gracious care is peculiarly employed about the new-born babes of his family, and those who are grown hoary in his service. The history of the life of an individual, from the womb to the grave, is a kind of abstract of the history of Israel, through their successive generations: and notwithstanding all our ingratitude and rebellions, we have each of us experienced numberless instances of JEHOVAH's powerful protection and tender care over us. If then we have learned to trust and love him, we need not be anxious about our remaining years or days; he will still watch over us, and proportion our strength and comforts to our trials; he will bear with, carry, and deliver us, both as the creatures of his power, and as new created by his Spirit. We may then regard with equal pity those who lavish their gold in vain superstitions or ruinous pleasures, and those who hoard and idolize it, though it can do them no good in the time of trouble. Did we indeed show ourselves men in understanding, we should with shame renounce all kinds of ungodliness and iniquity, as they are altogether unmanly and irrational: but by yielding to our propensities as fallen creatures, we forfeit our distinction as reasonable beings, and become either brutish or diabolical. Let transgressors then call to mind the works and words of God: let them consider that there is none like him, or that can do as he doeth: let them notice how he hath declared the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things that are now doing but not yet completed: and let them remember, that, however they may behave, "his counsel shall stand and he will do all his pleasure;" He will certainly bring to pass all that he hath purposed and spoken, both of mercy to his people, and of vengeance on his enemies. Whilst men continue proud and stubborn, and stout-hearted in their rebellion against God, they are as far from the grace of the Gospel, as from the righteousness of the law. For the salvation of a sinner begins with a broken and contrite heart, that trembles at God's word; with true repentance, submission to God's righteousness, and faith in his mercy, through the obedience unto death of our divine Surety; and this issues in reconciliation unto God, and the willing obedience of love and gratitude. The righteousness of God in Christ is now brought near: his salvation is revealed in his word, and communicated through his ordinances; all believers partake of it, and become the glory of the Lord, who is magnified in and by them. Let then the stout-hearted hearken unto him, and humble themselves before him; that he may be glorified in their salvation, and not in their destruction.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVII. V. 1—3. Babylon, (as the capital of the Chaldean empire, which succeded to the Assyrian,) had never been subdued before Cyrus took it. The city is therefore represented under the emblem of a fair virgin in great distress, who is called the daughter of Babylon or of the Chaldeans. Instead of being seated, as heretofore, upon a throne, ruling over other cities and nations, and being called tender and delicate, as exempted from hardships and calamities; she was now to come down, and sit upon the bare ground, and as an abject slave to grind corn with those hand-mills, that were in use before the invention of water-mills and wind-mills; which was the lowest and most laborious of menial services. Nay, she must be driven bare-headed, with dishevelled locks, and almost naked before the victor, in order to ford the rivers, through which the captives were driven like herds of cattle; and be entirely uncovered to be examined for sale, after the indecent and inhuman manner, in which negroes are now exposed like cattle, in the places where the slave-trade is carried on. For the Lord would not meet her with the compassion or the weakness of a man, who might be resisted or appeased, but to take righteous vengeance on her as the Almighty God. Or, "I will not admit man to intercede for her;" as some explain the clause, which is rather obscure. What is spoken of Babylon, under the emblem of a woman, must be understood of the calamities, that would overtake numbers of her inhabitants, in the different ravages to which that devoted city would be exposed. (Notes, &c. xiii. xiv.)

V. 4. The prophet, representing the believing Jews, in prospect of these events, interrupts his prediction by thus exulting in the LORD of Hosts, as the Redeemer and Holy One of Israel.

V. 5. 'Silence and darkness are opposed to that noise 'and gayety, which is seen in rich and populous cities.' (Lowth.)

V. 6. 'I have laid open my inheritance to the insults 'of idolaters, and suffered them to profane the city and 'sanctuary, which was called by my name.' (Lowth.) The Chaldeans, intent on gratifying their own ambition, rapacity, and indignant revenge, and perhaps enmity to the God of Israel, most cruelly entreated the Jews, when they got them into their power; not knowing or regarding the design of God, in thus giving his worshippers into their hand: so that, while they accomplished his righteous purposes, without intending it, they brought down deserved judgments on themselves. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7—10. Notwithstanding these predictions against Babylon, the king and his nobles deemed their dominion and prosperity firmly and permanently established; they laid neither their own crimes, nor the words of God to heart, nor considered what the end of their greatness would be. The inhabitants were given up to pleasures and dissipation; and arrogantly concluded that no city or empire ever had been, was, or would be, like their own; and they expressed this sentiment in language similar to that, by which JEHOVAH declared his own eternal Deity. (xlv. 5, 6.) —The loss of empire, and the destruction of the inhabitants, are to ruling cities like widowhood, and loss of children. Babylon thought herself perfectly secure from these afflictions: but the Lord declared, that they would come upon her in one day, in a moment, most suddenly, and in their perfection; for or notwithstanding, the multitude of her sorceries and enchantments. The Chaldeans trusted much to these practices, and disregarded the all-seeing eye of Israel's God; but the permanent prosperity, with which she was thus flattered, would not be vouchsafed her.

V. 11. Neither the politicians nor sorcerers of Babylon could discover from what quarter evil would come upon them; nor when it approached could they retard it: nay, at last it would come on them suddenly, when they had no apprehension of it. Cyrus surprised the city, when the inhabitants were all asleep, or in their drunken revels, and entirely without fear of the impending ruin.

V. 12—15. The Lord here challenged the Chaldeans to oppose their enchantments to the execution of his predictions: let them persist in them, and do their utmost, and see whether they could prevail in the contest. Babylon, from the time it became a city, was renowned for these arts, and the Chaldeans diligently studied and practised them. Even their wise men and counsellors were chiefly diviners and astrologers. They pretended to obtain information and direction from the motions of the heavenly bodies; and supposed the stars to have great influence on the affairs of men, which they could discover by making observations on them: and they seem to have published every month their prognostications, as some almanac-makers now do their yearly predictions about the weather, &c. But the Lord declared, that they should all weary themselves in vain, in their counsels to secure Babylon; nay, themselves should be as stubble to the fire of his indignation, by which they should be totally consumed without any remains. And in this catastrophe, all those, who had before dealt with them for such information; or the merchants and hired soldiers from other countries, that had traded with and helped them, would desert them, go to their respective habitations, and leave them to shift for themselves. All these predictions concerning Babylon relate also to the New Testament-Babylon, the chief seat of Antichrist. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord invariably abases the proud in proportion as they exalt themselves. They, who are most delicate and luxurious, and given up to self-indulgence and dissipation, are commonly most unfeeling towards such as are subjected to them; often showing no respect to old age or infirmities, and deeming no hardship too great to impose on them. But they may probably be recompensed by others as severe and hard hearted as themselves: while labour and fatiguing usage, with scorn and cruelty, will be dreadful to them, in proportion to their former excessive effeminacy. Those distinctions in society, by which some are exalted above others, as if of another species, will be of short continuance: kings and nobles will not be such for ever; nor will God any more regard sex than rank, in those that rebel against them. But they who are made kings and priests unto our God, shall be distinguished for ever: for "their "Redeemer is the LORD of hosts, the Holy One of Israel;" and when the most honourable of the wicked shall be silent in darkness, or only vent their anguish in wailing and gnashing of teeth, the believer's redemption will be completed. God is often pleased to permit wicked men to prevail against his people, in order to correct and purify them by tribulation: and he permits his inheritance, his professed servants, to be polluted and treated as heathens; in order to purge his Church from hypocrites, and to warn others not to abuse their privileges. But they who take advantage of these dispensations, to abuse their power and to show their enmity against God, by cruelly oppressing his worshippers, will be punished with proportionable severity. Pride renders men presumptuous in their wickedness and regardless of their latter end: so that they lay not to heart either the warnings or the judgments of God; they expect impunity, notwithstanding his wrath revealed from heaven against their iniquities; and they are confident of permanent prosperity, until ruin comes upon them suddenly and in its perfection, and they can neither see whence it ariseth nor how it may be avoided. Such as trust not in God, buoy up their confidence by means of their wickedness; and they are ready to think that no eye seeth those secret crimes which man cannot detect. And whilst men will not believe the authenticated truths of God, because they contradict their pride and lusts, they often become the dupes of their own credulity, and of the vilest impostors: even of such as pretend to gratify their curiosity, by informing them of future events; and humour them with promises of great prosperity, without disquieting their consciences, or requiring them to renounce their sins. Hence the encouragement which sorcery, divination, astrology, and fortune-telling of every kind, have ever met with, in proportion as the holy truths and precepts of God's word have been disregarded. But the Lord scorns and abhors such daring attempts to pry into his secret purposes, or to escape his threatened vengeance. However men may labour and weary themselves in such vain endeavours, they will never be able to prevail for others or themselves; they will shortly be destroyed root and branch, by the consuming fire of the Lord's indignation; and it will appear, that they could neither foresee, nor prevent, the ruin to which they were exposed. But if we credit the word of God, we may know assuredly how it will be with the righteous and the wicked to all eternity; we may learn how to escape the wrath to come, to glorify God, to have peace through life, and hope in death, and everlasting happiness beyond the grave: and surely we need desire no further information in these matters. Let us then stand aloof from all these delusions of men and of the great deceiver, and learn to walk by faith, through the troubles of life and the vale of death, to the land of perfect light, joy, and felicity.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLVIII. V. 1, 2. The Jews gloried in their descent from Jacob, and in the name of Israel which God had in honour conferred on him; they boasted also of springing from Judah, (as waters from the fountain,) to whom the sceptre belonged, and from whom the Messiah was to descend. They were likewise accustomed to use the name of JEHOVAH in solemn oaths, and to mention him as their God; they prided themselves upon their relation to that holy city, where his temple was built and his worship conducted: and on these accounts they were very confident that God would render them successful, and deliver them from all their enemies. Yet there was neither sincerity in their religion, nor holiness in their lives; they were deceitful and dishonest in their dealings; and they concealed their frauds by perjury and hypocrisy. It appears from the prophecies of Jeremiah, Amos, and Micah, that this was the general disposition of the people, just before the captivity. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3—5. In order to lead the people to be more earnest in their religion, the Lord again reminded them of the evidences, which prophecy afforded them of its divine authority. Nothing material had occurred, since the original of their nation, that had not been predicted. God had previously informed them what he meant to do; and then he had suddenly performed his word, when they had no expectation of it. He adopted this method, because he knew that they would be obstinate and untractable, even as if the sinews of their necks were made of iron; and bold and impudent in their objections and self-vindication, as if their brow were of brass: and being alienated from true religion and attached to idolatry, they would absurdly and ungratefully have ascribed their deliverances to their idols, had not JEHOVAH by his prophecies precluded them from such a pretence. 'The former things may point to the 'former prophecies, relating to the two confederate kings, '(vii.) and to Sennacherib; as the new things relate to 'Babylonian captivity, and their return from thence, as 'they were figures of the Gospel-times.' 'Suddenly, punc'tually at the time foretold, even when there was no like'lihood of such an effect being produced.' (Lowth.)

V. 6—8. The Jews had already heard the prophecies concerning them: let them therefore mark, and see the exact accomplishment of them: and would they not at length declare this to be a demonstration, that JEHOVAH alone deserved their worship: and publish his wonderful works, according to his word, to other nations and succeeding ages? From the time that former predictions had been accomplished, in their deliverance from the Syrians and Assyrians, the Lord showed them new things, hidden from all creatures, of which no tokens appeared, and of which they knew nothing. His word, as in creation, gave them as it were their first existence: before he spake of them, the Jews had never heard of them, and therefore they could not ascribe the discovery either to their idols or to their own sagacity. Yet, after all, the Lord foresaw that they would prove unbelieving and disobedient; and even shut their ears to instruction, however plainly set before them. For their ear had not been opened from the beginning: they had always been unteachable and self-willed; and they would continue to deserve the name of transgressor, apostate, or rebel, which he had given them in the infancy of their nation, when they first came out of Egypt. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9—11. The Lord saw nothing in the Jewish nation to induce him to deliver it from captivity: but the honour of his own great name was concerned. If the idolaters should finally prevail against his worshippers, their gods would seem to triumph over the God of Israel: it behooved him to perform his engagements to Abraham and to David, and to maintain his worship in the world. For his own sake, therefore, he would defer his anger, and not cast off the Jews till after the coming of the Messiah: for his own glory he would refrain from pouring out his indignation, and utterly destroying them. By various calamities he refined them, as metal in a furnace; and though they were not fully purified as refined silver, but still had a great mixture of base metal among them; yet he would again choose them amidst the afflictions of Babylon, as he had their fathers in the iron furnace of Egypt. This he would do, not for their sakes, but that his name might not be profaned, or his glory given to idols; (Marg. Ref.)—'I had 'respect to thy weakness and infirmity: for in silver there 'is some pureness, but in us there is nothing but dross.'—If the furnace of affliction had not been moderated, they must have been consumed. (Ps. cxxv. 3. Matt. xxiv. 22.)—'God joineth the salvation of his people with his own 'honour; so that they cannot perish, but his glory should 'be diminished.'

hand hath spanned the heavens: [m] when I call unto them, they stand up together.

14 All ye, [n] assemble yourselves, and hear; which among them hath declared these things? [o] The LORD hath loved him: [p] he will do his pleasure on Babylon, and his arm shall be on the Chaldeans.

15 I, even I, have spoken; yea, I have called him: I have brought him, and he shall [q] make his way prosperous.

16 Come ye near unto me, hear ye this; [r] I have not spoken in secret from the beginning; from the time that it was, there am I: and now [s] the Lord GOD and his Spirit hath sent me.

V. 12—15. The eternal and unchangeable God of Israel here calls upon his people to hearken to him. The same almighty power that had founded the earth, meted out the heavens with a span, and issued orders to their hosts, which were implicitly obeyed, was pledged to perform the predictions concerning the deliverance of the Jews from captivity. Let then all of them assemble, consider, and ask themselves, whether JEHOVAH or some of their idols, had foretold these things? that they might ascribe the accomplishment unto him. He meant to show especial favour to Cyrus (as a type of Christ,) in assigning him the honourable work of liberating his people. So that this prince would execute the Lord's pleasure, and be as his arm in taking Babylon and subduing the Chaldean monarchy: for God would call him to this arduous undertaking, and prosper him in it. Some indeed interpret the expression, my called, as referring to the call of Abraham, and the nation of Israel in him, which was a type or emblem of the effectual calling of the elect people of God: and others explain it of the Israelites being called by the name of God, as a people peculiarly belonging to him.

V. 16. There is some difficulty in ascertaining the speaker in this verse: but if the prophet be supposed to speak, it must be as a type of the Elect servant of JEHOVAH before predicted. (xlii. 1.) From the opening of his ministry Isaiah had publicly spoken of those things that were coming to pass, and events had accorded to his predictions; he had from the first been at hand to declare the will of the Lord: and now the Lord God and his Spirit had sent him to predict the captivity, with their deliverance from it; and it behooved them to come near and attend to his words. But this seems not by any means to come up to the energy and full meaning of the passage. The Word, that "was in "the beginning with God, and was God," and by whom the mind and will of God have ever been declared to men, evidently speaks in this place. He had ever addressed the nation in the most open manner, from the time that he appeared to Moses in the bush, and called himself, I AM THAT I AM: and He was ever present with Israel as their Lord and Redeemer. And now the Father and his Spirit had sent him to effect their predicted deliverance: or the Lord GOD had sent Him and his Spirit: for so the words may be read, and the language accords better to the ordinary style of Scripture. The deliverance from Babylon seems to be primarily intended; yet as shadowing forth the incarnation of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit, to apply his purchased redemption to the souls of men. 'The fore-'going part of the verse shows, that the words are spoken 'by God: and since it is affirmed, that the Lord GOD 'hath sent him; we can understand the words of none 'other, but the second Person of the sacred Trinity; who 'was sent into the world by his Father, and was anointed 'to his prophetical office by the Holy Spirit.' (Lowth.) 'Who is it that saith in Isaiah, "And now the Lord hath "sent me and his Spirit?" 'in which as the expression is 'ambiguous, it is the Father and the Holy Spirit, which 'have sent Jesus; or the Father who hath sent both Christ 'and the Holy Spirit.' (Origen in Bp. Lowth.)

V. 17—19. JEHOVAH, the Redeemer and Holy One of Israel, continues to speak to his people as groaning in captivity. He had taught them profitable things, and had pointed out to them the way in which they should have gone; and he was ever ready to afford his effectual teaching to such, as desired to profit by his word. This would have been more agreeable to his holy will, than their rebellions and calamities; so that, speaking after the manner of men, he, as it were, wished that they would have hearkened to his commandments: for then their peace would have flowed with an even uninterrupted course, like a river whose waters fail not: and he would have shown them how to obtain a righteousness vast as the ocean, and a permanent and inexhaustible source of blessings to their souls: their seed would then have been innumerable as the sand, and their name would never have been cut off, or cast out. Whereas for their sins they were reduced to a remnant, and to great distress and contempt. (Marg. Ref.)

CHAP. XLIX.

Christ declares to the nations his appointment and qualifications for his work; complains of ill success among the Jews; and receives assurances of being the Light of the Gentiles, and the source of salvation and consolation to vast numbers, 1—13. Zion thinks herself forgotten of God; but is assured of his unchangeable love, and that kings and nations shall be her children, to show her honour and to do her service, 14—23. The redemption of sinners from Satan's power, and the church from that of Antichrist, is predicted, with allusion to the deliverance of the captive Jews, 24—26.

V. 20—22. The Lord here addressed the people as if the time of the decree of Cyrus had been already come. They were summoned to go forth from Babylon, and flee from its devoted inhabitants, singing praises to the Lord, and publishing his truth, power, and love to the ends of the earth. When the Israelites passed through the wilderness from Egypt to Canaan, the waters gushed from the smitten rock to satisfy their thirst: and the Lord intimated that he would equally take care of the Jews in returning from Babylon to Jerusalem. But as the language is too strong to have received a full accomplishment in any of the events attending that deliverance; we may be assured that the Holy Ghost intended the spiritual blessings of redemption; and the wonderful interpositions, with which the rescue of the Church from Antichristian tyranny shall be accompanied, and the converted Jews conveyed back to the promised land. Whatever revolutions should take place, the Lord warned impenitent sinners, that no good would accrue to them; for all that inward anguish and outward tribulation, which spring from guilt and from the wrath of God, must inevitably be their portion, throughout every period of their endless existence.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—11.

Men may have a sound creed, make an open profession of true religion, and with apparent devotion make mention of the name of God, value themselves on their relation to his people, and join with them in the most solemn ordinances; and yet be mere hypocrites and destitute of common honesty in their dealings with their neighbours! Nay, men may have strong confidence in the Lord, and verily think that all the blessings of salvation belong to them: when they are entirely deceived by Satan and their own hearts, and have no more than a worthless form of godliness! Let us then be careful not to over-value external distinctions, privileges, or observances: and not to stay our souls on any relation to families, or churches, eminent for piety: let us examine whether we be indeed sincere in our professed faith and devotedness to God; and whether they produce truth and equity in all our dealings with men: let us remember that confidence without conscientiousness is presumption; and that they who cheat their neighbours, and varnish it over with a profession of godliness, will receive the greater damnation. May the Lord then search and prove us, and render "us doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving our own selves." Our religion is abundantly demonstrated to us, in the coincidence observable between the prophecies of the Bible, and the dispensations of Providence; so that infidelity, impiety, and hypocrisy will be left without plea or excuse: and this arrangement is purposely intended to leave every one without cloak for their sins. For the Lord knoweth how obstinate and daring men are in rebellion against his authority, and opposition to his truths. Indeed we are all by nature self-willed and presumptuous: we are ready to ascribe success to our own sagacity or good management, or even to that conduct which God abhors; and when calamities overtake us, we deem them the result of chance, or lay the blame on the ill behaviour of others. Thus we studiously forget God, and aim to exclude him from the government of the world. But the whole scheme of prophecy is a standing confutation of this preposterous system; as things hidden from every created mind, and which appear utterly improbable, have for ages been foretold in the sacred Scriptures, and are continually coming to pass accordingly. Yet how little is this attended to! how little are men disposed to receive instruction, and yield obedience to God! But hence arises another demonstration of the truth of the Scripture, which every man possesses in his own conscience. Contrary to our self-flattery, the Scripture declares, that every man dealeth very treacherously, and is a transgressor from the womb. And is not this witness true? has not each of us violated our obligations to God? and were not our first thoughts, words, and works rebellious and unholy? We have then nothing in ourselves to depend on, or to plead with God, as a reason why he should have mercy on us. Had he not deferred and refrained his anger, we should have been cut off and destroyed long ago. But he hath formed a plan, in which, for his own sake and for the glory of his grace, he saveth all that come to him for salvation. Thus sinners are encouraged to hope for his mercy. And he that "hath fled for refuge to lay hold on this hope set before him," hath the honour of God pledged for his security, that he shall never be cast off, or perish; for then would His name be polluted, and his glory tarnished. He will indeed refine his people in the furnace of affliction: but notwithstanding the alloy that remains after every visitation, he will yet confirm his choice of them; and frequently he first brings sinners acquainted with his grace, by casting them into this painful but salutary furnace.

V. 12—22.

to those who knew him not to the salvation of their own souls. But the Lord Jesus alone hath in every respect done the Father's whole pleasure, and is the adequate object of his love: having prospered and finished his work, he invites sinners to draw near and hearken, whilst he proclaims the counsels of his love, that have been from the beginning. As the Father hath sent him, so hath he sent his ministers, to publish openly his rich and free salvation; may he send forth more and more of them throughout the earth; and with them send forth his Spirit to apply his salvation; that 'glory may be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the 'Holy Ghost,' throughout the earth, and through eternal ages.—Let us seek to our Holy Redeemer to teach us to profit by all the means of instruction that we enjoy, and to lead us by the way that we should go; for blessed are they that hear his word and do it. Our sanctification and comfort are his will and delight; inward and outward peace are his legacy; and they, whom he justifies and sanctifies, have peace with God, peace of conscience, and an inward tranquillity which passeth all understanding: a peace, not transient and precarious, as the joys of this world are; but which flows on like a river through life and death, and to all eternity. The inheritance annexed to the righteousness which God bestows, is immense as the ocean, its blessings unnumbered like the sand, and it is attended with an everlasting name that shall not be cut off; and with an entail of advantages to our posterity. Let then sinners separate from the world, and break loose from their ruinous connexions: let them join themselves to the Lord with gratitude and joy: and let believers sing glad praises to the Redeemer, and declare to all around what he hath done for their souls. Though this world is a wilderness, in which many inconveniences await us, and nothing grows or springs forth suited to the wants and desires of the regenerated: yet from Christ, our smitten Rock, the consolations of the Holy Spirit flow forth abundantly to water all the camp of Israel, through all their wanderings; till each of us arrives at the Fountain-head above, and drinks abundantly of unalloyed felicity for ever. But this peace and joy are far from the wicked man: by an irrevocable decree he will be for ever precluded from them; and a tormenting conscience, a despairing heart, and furious, unrestrained, and malignant passions, will concur with the wrath of God, to render him as durably miserable, as the righteous is blessed in the favour, image, and presence of his God.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLIX. V. 1, 2. Hitherto spiritual redemption hath been predicted more obscurely, and with evident, and almost constant, reference to the deliverance of the Jews from captivity in Babylon: but here another division of the prophecy commences; and henceforth we shall have Christ and spiritual redemption constantly before our eyes, and shall often entirely lose sight of types and shadows. We cannot in this chapter admit, that Isaiah spoke of himself, even as the type of Christ: the language can in no sense be applicable to him, or to any but the divine Saviour of sinners; for who else was ever given to be "a Light of "the Gentiles, and for salvation to the ends of the earth?" Christ therefore was the speaker, in his mediatorial character, and as anticipating his incarnation. He opened his discourse by demanding the attention of the most distant nations, as he was about to declare those important truths, those deep things of God, in which they were all concerned. He had engaged to become incarnate for the redemption of mankind. As that event had been intended from before the foundation of the world, and predicted from the first entrance of sin: so before his conception in the virgin's womb "he was named Jesus, because he was to save "his people from their sins." The efficacy of his word to alarm, convince, and subdue the hearts of sinners to himself, and the energy of his denunciations to destroy his enemies, are denoted by "his mouth being like a sharp "sword." His human nature would be secured from sin, (which alone could defeat the end of his incarnation,) by its union with the Deity; even as if it had been hid, or covered, under the shadow of the Almighty's hand. And he would be in every respect prepared and qualified for his work, by the immeasurable communication of the Holy Spirit; as a polished shaft or arrow, which the warrior carefully conceals in his quiver, till he has occasion to employ it, to obtain some desired and expected victory. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The eternal Son of God willingly consented to "take upon him the form of a servant," that the Father might be glorified in saving sinners through him. He may be called Israel, as the head of the body of the Church, the true Israel of God; or as he wrestled and prevailed for the blessing of God upon his people, as Jacob prevailed for the blessing on himself and his posterity: Or it may be rendered, "Israel is he, in whom I will be glorified by "thee." The Redeemer, in the prospect of the general unbelief of the Jewish nation, intimated, that if the small remnant of that people should be all that obtained salvation by him, he should labour and spend his strength for nought, or in vain: for though the salvation of one soul must vastly over-pay all the labours and trials of any ordinary servant of God; yet the incarnation of his only-begotten Son, and his labours, obedience, sufferings, and death, demanded a far greater retribution. This he knew would be vouchsafed him; for his judgment was with the Lord, the righteous Judge; and his work with his God, who was competent to estimate its infinite worth, and to recompense it in that way

5 And now, saith the LORD, that formed me from the womb to be his servant, [m] to bring Jacob again to him, * Though [n] Israel be not gathered, [o] yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of the LORD, and my God shall be my strength.

6 And he said, † It is [p] a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the ‡ preserved of Israel: [q] I will also give thee for a Light to the Gentiles, [r] that thou mayest be my Salvation unto the end of the earth.

7 Thus saith the LORD, [s] the Redeemer of Israel, and his Holy One, [§] to him whom man despiseth, to him whom the nation abhorreth, [t] to a servant of rulers; [u] kings shall see and arise, princes also shall worship, because of the LORD that is faithful, and the Holy One of Israel, [x] and he shall choose thee.

8 Thus saith the LORD, [y] In an acceptable time have I heard thee, [z] and in a day of salvation have I helped thee: and I will preserve thee, and [a] give thee for a covenant of the people, [b] to ‖ establish the earth, [c] to cause to inherit the desolate heritages;

9 That thou mayest say [d] to the prisoners, Go forth: [e] to them that are in darkness, Shew yourselves: [f] they shall feed in the ways, and their pastures shall be in all [g] high places.

10 They [h] shall not hunger nor thirst; [i] neither shall the heat nor sun smite them: for [k] he that hath mercy on them shall lead them, even by the springs of water shall he guide them.

he desired; namely, by rendering it effectual for the salvation of multitudes of sinners. This is spoken to the distant nations; it represents the Redeemer's undertaking, after the manner of men, as the result of a stipulation betwixt the Father and the Son: and this serves as an interesting introduction to a prediction of the calling of the Gentiles, that they might enjoy the blessings which the Jewish nation refused: for otherwise no adequate benefit would result from the coming of the promised Messiah.

V. 5, 6. JEHOVAH, in the person of the Father, here addresses the Son, as become incarnate, (that is, in the divine purpose and prescience.) The primary object of his undertaking was to bring Jacob again to the true service and worship of God. Accordingly the personal ministry of Christ and the first labours of his apostles, were confined to the Jews; and their national rejection of Christ was the occasion of the apostles at length turning to the Gentiles. So that it was the settled plan of God, made known ages before, that though Israel were not gathered to the promised Messiah, as his subjects and disciples; yet should he be glorious in the eyes of the Lord, and be glorified by him; and God would be his Strength to render his Gospel successful. Thus when Christ was about to ascend into heaven, he said to his disciples, "All power is given unto me "in heaven and earth. Go ye, preach the Gospel to all na- "tions." So that compared with the full effects of his mediatory work, the conversion of a small remnant of the Jews, who were preserved from their national unbelief, would be a small matter: nay, the conversion of the whole nation would have been a light thing; for he was given to be the great and all-sufficient Source of spiritual knowledge and illumination, and the Author of eternal salvation to the nations of the earth in general.

V. 7, 8. The Father is "the Lord, the Redeemer "of Israel," as sending the Son to be the Redeemer: he created the worlds, and he redeemeth the Church, by the Son, and without him was not any thing created or redeemed; (Tit. iii. 4—6.) The Father here addresses the incarnate Son, as he, "whom man despised," and the Jewish nation abhorred; and whom their rulers, as well as Pontius Pilate and Herod, treated as a slave. This decisively marked out the person intended, when he appeared on earth; as every one must perceive, who compares these expressions with the history of our Lord's crucifixion, by the general demand of the Jewish nation and their rulers, and with every circumstance of scorn and abhorrence. This humiliation was, so to speak, the stipulated price of that glory which was to follow. For certainly kings would behold his glory, and rise up to acknowledge his supreme authority: nay, they would fall down before him, submitting to him as their king, yea, worshipping him as their God! The faithfulness of JEHOVAH was engaged to accomplish this promise; and the Holy One of Israel, being well pleased in him, as his beloved Son and righteous Servant, would choose him to be his King upon his holy hill of Zion: (Notes, Ps. ii.) When the Roman emperors embraced Christianity, this began to be accomplished: it hath been verified in many instances already, and will be more signally hereafter.—When he undertook our cause, his requests were presented "in an acceptable time, and in a day "of salvation," and the Father readily acceded to them. The prayers that he offered with strong crying and tears, in the days of his flesh, were also accepted, and answered by his resurrection and exaltation; and his intercession is always presented in an acceptable time; and every thing is granted that he intercedeth for. (Note, 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2.) Being thus preserved, and raised to the mediatorial throne, he was given as the Surety of the new covenant to sinners all over the earth, to establish it in the knowledge of God and true religion: and to cause sinners to inherit that heritage from which they had been expelled; and which lay desolate, as the land of Judah did during the captivity, until the restoration of the Jews established the land and caused them to inherit their desolated heritages.

V. 9—13. The conversion of the nations is here promised, under images taken from the deliverance of the captive Jews, and their return to Jerusalem. At the word of Christ, the prisoners of Satan, who were confined in the dark dungeons of ignorance, idolatry and vice, would be set at liberty, come forth, and show themselves among his redeemed subjects. His ordinances comfortably feed the souls of these his sheep, all their journey through life: no place is found so mountainous, as not to yield pasturage for them; or their pastures are situated on high places, inaccessible to their enemies: they are not incommoded by hunger or thirst; nor left to endure persecution, temptation, or affliction, without shelter, support, and consolation; for their merciful Redeemer conducts them, where the waters of life abound for their refreshment and consolation: (Note, Rev. vii. 13—17.) Even the loftiest mountains are made a highway, and a causeway or pavement is prepared over the low places, that nothing may discourage or obstruct them in their journey. The Lord then speaks, as if companies of converts flocking into the Church were in sight; and points them out to the spectators, some of them coming from the north, others from the west, and others from the land of Sinim; by which some province in Egypt, or some district in Arabia, seems to be meant.—All this denotes the clear instructions, unincumbered invitations, encouraging promises, and abundant out-pouring of the Spirit, which would combine in rendering the Gospel successful, especially in the primitive ages; as they will again when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in. In the prospect of events so merciful and comfortable to God's afflicted people, the heavens, and the earth, and their respective inhabitants are called upon to break forth into songs of joy and praise! (Marg. Ref.)—'The Hebrew 'word mesillah,' (translated high-ways,) 'signifies such 'ways as are raised with stone in low and marshy grounds. 'So the sense is exactly parallel with that, (xl. 4.) "Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain shall "be brought low." (Lowth.) That, however, relates to the change wrought in men's dispositions, preparing them to welcome the salvation of Christ; this, to the preparations made in the Gospel, for the believers' passing safely and comfortably through this evil world to heaven.

V. 14—16. The Jewish Church during the captivity, or the Christian Church as groaning under Antichristian superstition and tyranny, is here introduced, as ready to faint and despond; apprehending from appearances, that JEHOVAH her Lord and King had forsaken her and even forgotten her and her concerns: that is, the remnant of believers in such circumstances are tempted to think, that God will suffer his enemies to prevail against his cause. But he inquires of Zion, whether a tender mother can forget the infant for which she hath endured much pain and sorrow, and which she is accustomed to nourish at her breast? and so forget it, as without compassion to leave it to perish by hunger and neglect? But though this is the strongest of all natural affections; yet some mothers do neglect their offspring to indulge themselves, and suffer them to perish for want of proper attention; nay, others murder them, to conceal their own shame! it was therefore proper to add, that the love of God to his Church, admits of no such exceptions; the affection of a most tender mother forms but a faint emblem of his unchangeable love to his people, and He will never forget them. In allusion to customs then in use, of artificially marking upon their hands such objects as they wished continually to remember, He declares that he had "graven Zion on the palms of his "hands, and that her walls were continually before him." As the architect is continually mindful of the plan of his intended building, even whilst the rubbish is removing, in order to lay the foundation; so the Lord hath the whole plan of his Church, in its most flourishing state on earth and in heaven, always before him, during all the corruptions and tribulations she passeth through; and He will in the appointed periods, fulfil all his purposes, predictions, and promises to that effect.

V. 17. Thy children, &c. Or "thy builders," as in the old translation, with a trivial change in the punctuation. They who were appointed to build the city and walls of Zion, would speedily begin and accomplish their work; and they, who had destroyed and wasted her, would haste to escape from her. Thus Cyrus hasted to take Babylon, and having accomplished that design, when he succeeded to the kingdom, he hasted to give orders for rebuilding Jerusalem and the temple: the dominion of the Chaldeans, the destroyers of Zion, was speedily terminated, and they departed, as unable to retard her returning prosperity. The speed and success with which Nehemiah rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem, notwithstanding the opposition of the enemies, may also be adverted to. But the deliverance of the Church from Antichristian oppressors; and the final and universal prevalence of true religion, are doubtless especially intended.

V. 18—21. Zion is here addressed in the character of an afflicted widow, bereaved also of her children. She is directed to look up, and behold numbers approaching her from every quarter; and the Lord most solemnly assures her, that they come in order to be a comfort and honour to her: and that instead of the disconsolate attire and appearance, which had hitherto befitted her condition, this great accession to her family should render her adorned and cheerful as a bride. The desolate and waste places of the land also would soon be replenished, that there would not be room for all the inhabitants; who would no more be annoyed or alarmed by those enemies, who had before swallowed them up. So that, after Zion's former desolations, her children should be so numerous that they would earnestly demand more room. The destruction of the Jews by the Chaldeans, and afterwards by the Romans, and the rejection of the Jewish nation for their unbelief, were to that Church as the loss of children: the state of the Jewish Church during the captivity, and that of the Christian Church during the reign of antichrist; and especially that of the Jewish nation for above seventeen hundred years, has resembled a desolate widow in captivity, wandering from place to place, without prospect of having or bringing up children: and the replenishing of the Church after these desolations, might seem as the resurrection of her children from the dead, or their return to her after they had been supposed dead; or it was like the case of a poor forlorn widow to whom many show the respect and affection of children, for whom she hath suffered no pain, and bestowed no labour: and she could not imagine whence these children came, or where they had been during her destitute and wandering condition. After the captivity, the Jews were vastly increased; they not only filled the land of Judah, but multitudes inhabited the adjacent cities and countries: and many were proselyted to their religion, and became Zion's adopted children. Yet, the context and the expressions lead us rather to interpret the passage of the enlargement of the Church, by breaking down the partition-wall, and by the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ; which hath already diffused the worship of the true God far more widely than of old; and which, after the recall of the Jews into the Church, shall at length fill the whole earth with the knowledge of his glory.

V. 22, 23. JEHOVAH here further explains how this increase of Zion's family would be effected. By the death of Christ and the preaching of the Gospel, his hand was lifted up to summon the nations, and his standard erected for them to resort to. The numerous converts made from among the Gentiles are represented under the idea of many nations at once bringing Zion's sons and daughters home to her, with the greatest care and tenderness; especially as they employed their ability to promote the cause of the Gospel. Even kings would become foster-fathers, and queens nursing-mothers to the children of Zion, accounting it their honour and privilege to use their influence and authority to promote the success of the Gospel; rendering the most profound respect to the Church; not attempting to have dominion over her faith, but subserving her comfort and prosperity, and showing her honour for the Lord's sake, proportioned to the contempt and indignity with which she had been treated. Then would it appear more than ever, that the immutable truth, power, and love of JEHOVAH were engaged in behalf of his people; and that they who wait for him shall never be put to shame. 'Artaxerxes, 'and other Persian monarchs, showed signal favour to the 'Jews; and Esther saved the nation from utter destruc-'tion: but the prophecy was more remarkably fulfilled, 'when Constantine and other Christian princes and prin-'cesses, showed favour to the Church.' (Lowth.) There can, however, be no dispute, but the grand accomplishment of these predictions is yet future.

shall be delivered: for [x] I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and [y] I will save thy children.

26 And [z] I will feed them that oppress thee with their own flesh; and they shall be [a] drunken with their own blood as with * sweet wine: [b] and all flesh shall know that I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.

V. 24—26. The Jews were delivered into the hand of the Chaldeans for their sins: thus they became the prey of the mighty. It was also just in God thus to punish them, and in a sense they might be deemed lawful captives: and could it be expected that the victors would release them, or that they would be rescued from them? In answer to this objection, the Lord engaged, that he would take them out of the hand of their terrible and powerful oppressors, contending with them, and saving Zion's children from them; yea, retaliating their cruelties with most terrible vengeance.—Sinners are justly given up for their crimes to be slaves and captives of Satan: but Christ, having paid their ransom, delivers them from his power, and avenges their cause on this great enemy and his angels and servants. But I apprehend, that under the shadow of the destruction of the Chaldean Monarchy to make way for the deliverance of the Jews; or of the Pagan Roman empire, by means of their mutual discords, to make way for the establishment of Christianity; the dreadful judgments that are to be executed on the antichristian Roman empire, in order to the liberating of the Church, and the restoration of the Jews into it, are especially predicted. (Notes, &c. xxxiv. Rev. xviii. xix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

We should here be all attention, for the Lord Jesus speaks to us who inhabit these distant isles, in accents of love, united with wisdom, authority, and truth; informing us of what he hath undertaken and performed for our salvation. The dignity of his person, the depth of his humiliation, the immensity of his love, the extremity of his agonies, the unsearchable riches of his grace, and the suitableness of his whole character, offices, and salvation to our necessities, unite in warning us, "not to refuse him that "speaketh:" but they equally encourage the poor trembling sinner to draw near, and venture his soul into his gracious hands. For the Son of God became incarnate, and "obedient even to the death upon the cross," that he might be "able to save to the uttermost all that come to God, "through him." The salvation of sinners of every nation to the glory of God the Father, was the recompense which he required when he undertook his arduous work; and which the Father was equally willing to grant unto him. For, love to us when enemies, moved him to give his only begotten Son to be the propitiation for our sins: his human nature was formed in the Virgin's womb by the power of the Holy Ghost, and preserved through life holy and undefiled, that it might be an acceptable and an all-sufficient atonement for sin: he was also carried through his sufferings, raised from the dead, exalted to the throne of glory, and perfected in every thing which might make him "the "Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey him." The sharp sword of his mouth, his quick and penetrating word, is employed in slaying the lusts, as well as the enemies of those that trust in him; but it will cut off all those that persist in their enmity and disobedience. His sharp arrows wound the conscience: but when the sinner submits and supplicates mercy, he heals the wounds that he had inflicted, and the transient pain makes way for durable joy; but these arrows will rankle for ever in the consciences of those who will not be his subjects. It will not in the event appear a light thing, which he hath effected on earth: innumerable multitudes of the tribes of Jacob and of the Gentiles, have been raised up from the depths of guilt and misery; and through him, their Light and Salvation, have now arrived in the realms of bliss, and before the throne are celebrating his praises. Numbers are continually enlightened and saved by him, in the most remote regions, whence daily accessions are made to the Church triumphant: and he will be more and more the Light and Salvation of the Gentiles, till "all kings shall fall down be-"fore Him, and all nations shall do him service;" "because "of the LORD that is faithful, and the Holy One of "Israel who chooseth him." These considerations may encourage and instruct his ministers. We should not despond, because of the contempt, reproach, or ill success, with which we meet. We should rather be made more instant in prayer, and more diligent in using every means by which we may be rendered as polished shafts, and suitable instruments, for his work. If we seem to labour and spend our strength for nothing, we should remember that comparatively our labours are of small value, and easily overpaid: that they may prove more useful than we suppose; and that "our judgment is with the LORD, and our work "with our God." And if there should be no gathering of sinners to Christ through our ministry; yet the Lord will honour those that honour him, and welcome them at length with "Well done, good and faithful servants." He will also be our Strength and our sure Protector: and if he employ us in rescuing a few souls from destruction, and in leading them to Christ for light and salvation; we ought to count it a great thing, though we should labour and pray to be made more extensively useful.

V. 7—15.

Even the Redeemer, who spake as never man spake, seemed often, in his personal ministry, to labour in vain, and to spend his strength for nought: and his sufferings and death will eventually increase the condemnation of numbers that hear his Gospel. He was, and still is, despised and abhorred by the nation to which he was sent, and by mankind in general: and many rulers have opposed, and modelled his Gospel, and made his truths and ordinances subservient to their political purposes; as if He were indeed their Servant, instead of their Lord. Yet is he glorious,

CHAP. L.

The Lord Christ shows that the Jews were rejected through their obstinate wickedness and unbelief: declares his power and fitness for his work; and speaks of his voluntary humiliation and patient sufferings, as assured of being delivered, justified, and rendered victorious over all enemies, 1—9. He encourages afflicted and tempted believers, and denounces the ruin of presumptuous transgressors, 10, 11.

THUS saith the LORD, Where is [a] the bill of your mother's divorcement, whom I have put away? [b] or which of my creditors is it to whom I have sold you? Behold, [c] for your iniquities have ye sold yourselves, and for your transgression is your mother put away.

and shall be glorified: all judgment is administered by Him, and all power is in his Hand to fulfil his great designs. The Father "heareth him in an acceptable time, and "in a day of salvation;" and He hath said, "Ask of me, "and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, "and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession:" and whilst some are broken to pieces with his iron rod, others, even kings and princes, shall arise to behold him, and fall down to worship him, as given "for a Covenant "to the people, and to establish the earth." We also, whom he employs as "workers together with him; while "we beseech our fellow-sinners not to receive the grace "of God in vain," giving no offence in any thing, that our ministry may not be blamed; may assure them, that now, (when the Gospel is preached to them,) is the accepted time and the "day of salvation;" seeing we speak in his name, who ever liveth to intercede effectually for all, that come through him to the mercy-seat of our forgiving God. In the persevering use of these means, we may hope at length to have our prayers answered; and that the Lord Jesus will himself speak to the prisoners of Satan, and say, "Go forth, show yourselves;" and that many of them will appear in the way to Zion, and learn to feed as they go, upon the spiritual provisions of his Gospel. Then our business will be, carefully to prepare food for them, by the faithful preaching of the word, and administering his ordinances; and to cast up, and make plain his high-ways, and remove all stumbling blocks out of them. But let those, that are setting out in this heavenly pilgrimage, remember, that Christ himself will both feed and guide them by the springs of grace and consolation: and then they will neither hunger, nor thirst, nor miss their road, nor be tempted above what they are able; but arrive safe at their journey's end. And whilst heaven resounds with joy over sinners from every quarter, brought to repentance and faith in Christ; surely we on earth also should join in their songs of praise, anticipating in the midst of our afflictions, the comforts prepared by our merciful God for his Church and people!

V. 16—26.

Alas! through sin and unbelief, and by means of sore conflicts, temptations, and distresses, we are often disposed to complain and despond, both respecting our own concerns and those of religion at large. This is both dishonourable to God and uncomfortable to ourselves, and we do very wrong in yielding to it. The strongest love of the most indulgent mother bears no comparison to the everlasting love of Christ to his Church, which he hath purchased with the travail of his soul, and to whom he gives "his "flesh to be meat indeed, and his blood to be drink in-"deed." As far as we have scriptural evidence, that we belong to this ransomed flock, we may be as sure that he will never forsake us, as that he will never forget his Zion. Our names are engraven on his hands and on his heart; and he hath not only assured us, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against his Church, but that none shall ever pluck his sheep out of his almighty hands. Let us then "give diligence to make our calling and election sure," and rejoice in the hope of the glory of God. And let us wait and pray for the performance of all these glorious prophecies. By faith, we may lift up our eyes, and behold multitudes from every land, gathering together to replenish and adorn the Church. We may view the whole of those nations, in which Christianity is professed, (which at present are in many places very desolate, and a land of destruction,) filled with true believers: we may behold these bounds of the Redeemer's kingdom broken down, in answer to the prayers of Zion's children, complaining that the place is too strait for them: we may observe the despised and forlorn condition of the Church exchanged for such liberty, prosperity, light, holiness, and honour, as baffle description. We may hear the signal given, the ensign erected, the sons and daughters of the Church brought in from every quarter; and kings, and queens, and all the nobles of the earth, vying with each other, who shall show most honour to true godliness, and do most service to the cause of Christ their Lord. We may view Satan, that mighty and terrible one, deprived of his prey, seized, bound, cast into the bottomless pit, and not allowed to deceive the nations any more: and all those powers, that have combined to enslave, corrupt, and persecute the Church, made to feed on their own flesh, and to be drunken with their own blood, by his power, who will contend with all that contend with his people, and avenge them upon their enemies; that all the earth may know, that our Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty One of Jacob. Let us then seek for ourselves complete redemption from the power of Satan, the god of this world; and then we may rejoice both in the hope of our own final salvation, and also of the final victory on earth of that cause which we favour. And we may consider every effort that we make to rescue our fellow-sinners, as, in a small and remote degree, helping to bring forward that great revolution, which will cause increasing joy in heaven to holy angels, and to the spirits of just men made perfect.

NOTES.

CHAP. L. V. 1—3. The preceding chapter concluded with predictions, that refer to the recovery of the Jews from their present dispersions, as well as to the deliverance of the Church from antichristian tyranny. This relates to the cause of that dispersion. The Lord had espoused the Church of Israel, (the mother of individuals of that nation,) by the covenant ratified with her at mount Sinai; but since her rejection of Christ, she has been like a divorced woman. The law required him that put away his wife, to give her a bill of devorcement, assigning the causes of her dismission, which frequently were very frivolous. But if the Jews should produce the bill of their mother's divorcement; it would appear, that she was not put away on trivial pretences, but for her violation of the covenant, for her idolatries and iniquities, especially for crucifying the promised Messiah, and obstinately opposing his Gospel. It was also customary on some other occasions for children to be sold into slavery, by the parent's consent to satisfy his creditors, or by a judicial sentence. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the Jews were sold into the hands of the Romans, and have been enslaved and oppressed ever since: but it cannot be pretended that the Lord had sold them on any such account: indeed they were punished as criminals for their iniquities, and had none to blame but themselves for their miseries. For when the Lord came, even the eternal "Word, who from the beginning was with God "and was God," to his own people, "his own received "him not:" when he called them to follow him, they answered him not. And wherefore were they thus regardless and disobedient? they expected a mighty temporal prince and conqueror; and he appeared "in the form of a ser-"vant," to be their spiritual Redeemer: and they concluded, that he was not able to deliver them, or to defend them against the Romans. But could they behold his unparalleled miracles, and think that his hand was so shortened that it could not redeem? or that he had no power to deliver? These proved him to be the same, and to possess the same power, that had formerly dried up the Red Sea and desolated the rivers of Egypt, turning their waters into blood, and causing the fish to die and putrify: the same power, that caused the tremendous plague of hail and the more tremendous plague of darkness; and which was able at any time to repeat or vary these miracles, and to clothe the heavens with darkness, and make sackcloth their covering. This may refer to the darkness that covered the land, during Christ's crucifixion; as that was an apt emblem of his dreadful vengeance, about to be poured out on his crucifiers. The power which rebuked the tempestuous winds and waves, extorted obedience from legions of unclean spirits, and called the dead out of their graves, was evidently adequate to effect any deliverance, and to equal and exceed all that had been done for Israel by the Lord, from the beginning to that day.

V. 4. In the preceding verses we suppose that Christ spake as JEHOVAH; here he speaks as Mediator; for there is not the least intimation of any change in the Speaker: and the things spoken in the following verses are inapplicable in many respects to Isaiah; for they refer to distant events, and evidently accord to Christ. If indeed we believe Jesus to be God and man in one person, we shall not be surprised to find him sometimes speaking, or spoken of, as the Lord GOD, and at other times as man, and the Servant of Jehovah. This is frequent in the New Testament, and there are undeniable instances of it in the Old: (xl. 1—12. xlii. 1—4. Zech. ii. 8, 9.) The encouraging tendency of Christ's ministry, his condescension and his unrivalled qualifications as a Teacher, rendered the obstinate unbelief of the Jews inexcusable. He was especially qualified and comissioned by the Father, to declare those truths, which give seasonable comfort to the broken heart and wounded conscience, and to those that are weary of sin, or harassed with temptations and afflictions; (Matt. xi. 28—30.) This characterized his ministry, and the Gospel-dispensation. And as the Spirit of the Lord GOD was upon him, that he might speak as never man spake: so the same divine influence wakened him morning by morning, to pour out his prayers, to preach the Gospel, and to receive and deliver the whole will of the Father, with that exact attention, that the learner pays, or he that is learned hath paid, to the voice of the teacher.

V. 5, 6. How far Isaiah, as the type of Christ, was exposed to these indignities, we cannot tell: but the history of Jesus compels us to explain the whole of him exclusively. Spitting in any one's presence has, in the east, been always considered as an intolerable expression of contempt; how much more to spit in a man's face! before the high priest, chief priests, and rulers, the servants and others repeatedly spat in the face of our adorable Redeemer. (Marg. Ref.) The perfect holiness of the Saviour disposed him to open his ears to every commandment of the Father, and to render absolute obedience, through difficulties, temptations, and sufferings, even to the death upon the cross. (Note, Ps. xl. 6—8.) So that he turned not back, but willingly submitted to repeated scourgings, and to the insults of the officers of the high priest, and of the soldiers of Herod and Pilate, who plucked off his beard, and spat in his face, as the utmost expressions of their scorn and derision.

V. 7—9. Our blessed Saviour steadily went through his sufferings, by faith in the promise of the Father. He was assured of support and deliverance, and that he should effect the purpose for which he suffered, and not be confounded by disappointment. Therefore he set his face like a flint, in immoveable constancy and intrepidity. He knew that his cause was good and his righteousness perfect, and that all his accusers would be found liars; for the Lord was at hand to justify him. Who then would dare to contend with him, or to lay any thing to his charge? Let them come forward, and stand together before Him, whose right it was to decide the cause; for he knew, that God would not condemn him, and who else could? Every one therefore that attempted it would soon lose all his credit and distinction, and become contemptible as an old moth-eaten garment. This was verified in the resurrection and ascension of Christ, and by the pouring out of the Spirit upon his disciples; in the entire abolition of the authority of the Jewish high priest and council, that first condemned Christ; and in the subversion of the Roman empire, by whose authority he was delivered up to be crucified. The justification of Christ our Surety was an earnest of the justification of the whole body which he represented; and every true believer may on this ground give a similar challenge to all his enemies. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10, 11. The darkness of temptation, and anguish of body and mind, through which the Redeemer passed to his glory, forms a proper ground of consolation to his suffering people. He here addresses especially the Christian Church, or the Jewish converts, in the midst of the calamities which befel them, about the time when Jerusalem was desolated: but the words are equally applicable to afflicted and distressed Christians in every age. They fear the Lord, and obey the voice of Christ, his elect Servant, as made known to them by his word and ministers; and accordingly repent and believe, and follow after holiness: yet they may walk in darkness; they may be exposed to continued afflictions, and unkind treatment from the world, and experience sore temptations, conflicts, fears, and discouragements, and not be able to obtain the light of prosperity or consolation. But let them trust in the mercy, truth, power, and wisdom of the Lord, and stay themselves upon him as their covenanted Friend, for direction, support, and deliverance; let them wait for him, and he will not fail their expectations. 'This shows, that 'it is a rare thing, that any should obey aright God's true 'ministers, though they labour to bring them from hell to 'heaven.' But they who amuse themselves with their own devices; who rely on their own wisdom, strength, or righteousness; who exult in worldly prosperity, or sensual pleasures; or who are pleased with schemes of infidelity, hypocrisy, superstition, or enthusiasm, refuse the light of the word, and kindle a fire of their own in its stead.—They compass themselves about with its sparks, and walk by the glimmering light of its blaze: but they will soon be extinguished together; and by the power and wrath of Christ, they will lie down in sorrow, outer darkness, and despair. The Jews, who rejected the Redeemer, and pleased themselves with their own projects of deliverance from the Romans, to their ruin, seem to have been primarily intended.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It will appear, in the great day of account, that the destruction of sinners was chargeable upon themselves alone. God never deprived any of his rational creatures of their advantages, except for their sins. This was the cause of angels being cast out of heaven, and man out of paradise; and it is the only source of all the miseries which we feel or fear. For this we are, as it were, sold into slavery to Satan and our lusts, and sin reigneth unto death. But after all our violations of the divine law, we shall yet be happy if we do not reject the Gospel: for he, that might have come with irresistible power to execute vengeance upon us, hath graciously appeared in the flesh to save sinners; and he calls upon each of us to believe and follow him. Wherefore then are men so backward to hear and obey his call? Hath he not power to save and to destroy? Did not his miracles proclaim his authority over all nature and all creatures, even during his humiliation on earth? The darkness and prodigies which attended his sufferings and death, proclaimed that "truly this was the Son of God," and anticipated the evidence of his glorious resurrection. Hath his exaltation to the throne of glory at all shortened his

CHAP. LI.

The Lord encourages his Church, by the example of Abraham, to trust in him, and promises comfort, 1—4. He contrasts the certainty and perpetuity of his salvation, with the short continuance of the visible creation, and the feebleness of persecutors; and warns his people against the dread of reproach, 5—8. The Church calls on God to renew his wonderful works in her behalf; and receives assurances of comfort and prosperity, with a rebuke for her unbelief and fear of man, 9—16. The Jews, in their past and present distresses, are assured of deliverance, and of the punishment of their oppressors, 17—23.

hand that he cannot redeem, or deprived him of power to deliver? and cannot he, who shall shortly raise the dead, burn the world, and destroy the wicked with everlasting perdition, make up to us all we can lose, and support us under all we can suffer for his sake? His mercy and condescension also are equal to his power and majesty. He received from the Father those encouraging words which he once spoke in person, and now delivers to us by his ministers. Still he calls the weary and heavy-laden to come to him, that they may find rest to their souls: his word affords seasonable cordials for the mourning, the tempted, and the discouraged; he knows how to apply them to their hearts by his comforting Spirit: and he is ready, from day to day, to hear their prayers and alleviate their distresses. In many of these things, he is the pattern for his ministers to follow. They should seek to the Lord God to give them the tongue of the learned, that they may know how to speak seasonably to the afflicted and broken-hearted: they must awake morning by morning, that they may study and learn, and then teach, the word of God, and become "workmen "that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of "truth." Their ear also must be opened to hear, and their heart prepared to obey, the commandments of God, that they may become examples to the flock. And as the incarnate Son of God was not rebellious, and shrunk not back from obedience in his arduous undertaking, which required him to endure pain, shame, and agonies unknown: surely we should be willing to endure hardship as his soldiers, and not deem any obedience too self-denying, or any suffering too sharp, to which he calls us. Let us then go forth with him out of the camp, bearing his reproach: and if we trust in his righteousness, copy his example, and suffer for his sake, the Lord God will help us too; and we may set our faces as a flint, assured that God will justify and deliver us, and confound all our adversaries and persecutors. Let then the Christian, "who feareth the Lord, "and obeyeth the voice" of his beloved Son, take courage, even "if he walk in darkness, and have no light:" let him confide in God to conduct him through every gloomy vale of affliction, temptation, and disconsolation; and through the vale of death to the everlasting light and joy of heaven. But as for those, who oppose, neglect, despise, or abuse this great salvation; their prosperity, confidence, and joy will be only as the expiring blaze and the vanishing sparks of a fire of thorns: and their boasted illuminations will only light them down to the regions of darkness and despair.

NOTES.

CHAP. LI. V. 1—3. This is evidently a continuation of the former chapter. Christ here again returns to speak a word in season to his discouraged people. Some suppose the captives at Babylon to be intended: but the scene appears to be laid in after times, and that captivity merely to have given occasion to the address, and their deliverance to have been a shadow of more extensive and important blessings. The desolations of Jerusalem by the Romans, the massacres of the Jews that attended and succeeded it, and the rejection of that nation, must needs cause great heaviness to others of the Jewish converts, as well as to St. Paul; and they might conclude, that the Lord's choice of Israel was finally vacated. The ten persecutions in the first three centuries were very trying to the faith and patience of the primitive Christians: the long continued oppressions that the Church hath laboured under from Antichristian persecutors, and the prevalence of superstition, idolatry, impiety, infidelity, and every kind of iniquity to this day, amongst professed Christians, have been, and are, very discouraging to all who love truth and holiness: and there is a time coming, when the dispersed Jews will need some ground in their Scriptures to encourage their hope of re-admission into the Church: and consolatory topics, suited to these several purposes, are suggested. They "who follow after righteousness and "seek the Lord," are here addressed; they have begun to desire and seek for the knowledge of God, and expect happiness in his favour; and they are using the appointed means of obtaining righteousness, that is, of being justified and sanctified, in order thereto. They are called upon to hearken to the voice of God, and to recollect the rock and the quarry, so to speak, whence the first stones of the spiritual building of the Jewish Church were taken. God

4 Hearken unto me, my people; and give ear unto me, [m] O my nation: for [n] a law shall proceed from me, and [o] I will make my judgment to rest for a light of the people.

5 My [p] righteousness is near; [q] my salvation is gone forth, and [r] mine arms shall judge the people; [s] the isles shall wait upon me, and on mine arm shall they trust.

6 [t] Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath: for [u] the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner: but [x] my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished.

7 [y] Hearken unto me, [z] ye that know righteousness, the people [a] in whose heart is my law; [b] fear ye not the reproach of men, neither be ye afraid of their revilings.

8 For [c] the moth shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm shall eat them like wool: but [d] my righteousness shall be for ever, and my salvation from generation to generation.

9 ¶ Awake, [e] awake, [f] put on strength, [g] O Arm of the LORD; awake, [h] as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. [i] Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded [k] the dragon?

10 Art thou not it which hath [l] dried the sea, the waters of the great deep; that hath made the depths of the sea a way for the ransomed to pass over?

called Abraham, an idolater, when advanced in years, with only Sarah his wife to attend him: and when it was become contrary to the ordinary course of nature for him to have children by her, the Lord, according to his promise, blessed and increased them into an innumerable multitude. So that he could, and certainly would, recover his Church from the lowest condition: he would comfort the remnant of believers, by reviving true religion in those places that had been waste and desert; and by planting them, like the garden of Eden, with every beautiful, excellent, and useful production: and this would cause joy and gladness, and thankful songs of praise to abound. The conversion of the Gentiles, to fill up the places in Zion that were desolated by the rejection of the Jews; the revival of evangelical religion, after it had lain long buried under the rubbish of popery; the restoration of the Jews into the Church, and her subsequent purity and enlargement, may all be predicted under these images.

V. 4—6. Here God our Saviour speaks to the Jewish nation; and calls on them to observe, that he would promulgate his laws, establish his ordinances, and declare his truths, among other nations; who being instructed by his holy word, would become his subjects and obey his commandments. His righteousness, as imputed to believers for justification, and his grace as imparted for sanctification, and the performance of his ancient promises, were now brought near; the glad tidings of his free and full salvation were gone forth, (for the scene is laid in the primitive times of Christianity;) his arms, or his universal authority and almighty power, would execute just judgment among the nations; and the most remote regions would learn to wait on him, and trust in him as alone able to save them. He would not fail, nor be discouraged, till this had generally taken effect: for his salvation, and the righteousness connected with it, would continue, not only after the ruin of successive generations of persecutors and opposers, but even after the heavens and the earth were grown old and vanished, and all their inhabitants were destroyed like the most contemptible insects: yea, they should never be abolished to all eternity.

V. 7, 8. There seems to be here an advance in describing the character of the persons addressed: perhaps intimating, that they "who follow after righteousness, and "seek the LORD," will "know righteousness," and be assured, that "being justified by faith, they have peace "with God," and enjoy his favour: having his law written in their hearts, loving it and delighting to obey it. This confidence would be necessary in order to their victory over the fear of man, especially in times of persecution: and they are encouraged not to fear the reproaches or revilings of those who spake all manner of evil against them falsely for Christ's sake, and then made their calumnies the pretext for their cruelties. For all their persecutors would soon decay, and perish like a moth-eaten garment: but the righteousness and salvation of the Lord would maintain their ground on earth through all generations; as well as continue for ever the felicity of the believer, who here suffered for adhering to them.

V. 9—11. The Church, encouraged by these assurances, calls upon her great Redeemer to awake and exert himself for her deliverance. She calls him "the Arm of the LORD," or his power; (and Christ is the Power, as well as the Word and Wisdom, of God; Marg. Ref.) she entreats him to put on strength, as in ancient days: for was he not the same almighty King who had destroyed Egypt and Pharaoh, and weakened that formidable power of which the dragon was an emblem? (Note, Ps. lxxiv. 13, 14:) Was not he the same who had divided the Red Sea, that his redeemed people might pass over? In this confidence the Church rests assured, that the people, (whom he hath now redeemed with his blood as well as by his power,) will obtain a joyful deliverance from every enemy. As the Jews of old returned from Babylon to Zion with songs of joy and praise; so will that nation be again received into the Christian Church; which shall long rejoice and prosper, freed from those enemies, oppressions, and corruptions that have so long harassed her: and enjoy such peace, purity, light, and felicity, as shall render her earthly state almost like heaven, where alone these expressions can be fully answered. (Note, xxxv. 10.)

V. 12—14. The Lord here engages to be the Comforter of his Church: and in that case what occasion had she to fear wretched dying men, who are cut down and wither as the grass? It must therefore be the effect of unbelief, forgetfulness of the Lord her Maker, and of the power engaged on her side, as she was continually terrified by the fury of oppressors, as if they were about entirely to destroy her; whereas their fury would speedily vanish and be no more found. But she complained and was alarmed, like a person who is exiled or in captivity, and was in great haste to be set at liberty, lest she should perish in the dungeon, or by famine. "He marcheth on with "speed, who cometh to set free the captive," &c. 'Cyrus, 'if understood of the temporal redemption from Baby-'lon: in the spiritual sense the Messiah.' (Bp. Lowth.) "The captive exile shall be quickly delivered: he shall "not die in the pit; neither shall his bread fail." (Lowth.) Either of these renderings contains an encouragement, and not a reproof: but the context rather leads us to think, that the persons concerned, while earnestly waiting and seeking for deliverance, were in a measure impatient, and weak in faith, and ready to conclude that the blessing, so long delayed, would never be vouchsafed; though expressly promised in the sacred Scriptures. Thus pious Christians, who have always grieved over the corruptions of the Church, and longed for deliverance from the spiritual captivity of antichrist, and for the predicted millennium; have been tempted, by the failure of many zealous attempts, to which they foreboded full success, and by the delay of an answer to their earnest prayers, to conclude that such a time would never arrive; and that superstition, ignorance, false doctrine, and wickedness, would prevail to the end of the world. 'The captive must starve and die 'in his dungeon, if not hastily liberated.'

V. 15, 16. The Church or the prophet had called on the Lord, that had divided the Red Sea; and he here answers to that call. He was still the same omnipotent Protector of his people, as when he brought Israel out of Egypt. But the latter verse must be addressed, either to Isaiah, or to the Messiah whom he predicted, and in some respects, typified. The Lord had put words in the prophet's mouth, which he delivered to the Church, to encourage her faith and direct her prayers; and he had preserved him, as under the shadow of his hand, that, with the converts made by his ministry, he might plant the heavens, as with trees of righteousness, and establish the earth, or the land, which had been greatly shaken in the reign of Ahaz. It is, however, obvious, that this interpretation falls vastly short of the energetic language here employed; which nothing can fully answer, but the glorious effects of the Messiah's coming into the world, being carried through his labours and sufferings, advanced to the mediatorial throne, and sending his Gospel to all nations, with the Holy Spirit to render it successful; thus replenishing heaven with holy inhabitants, establishing the moral state of the earth, and owning the despised Church, as a people near and dear to him. (Notes, xlix. 1—3.)

V. 17—20. The Lord here seems to address the Jews in their present dispersions. Jerusalem, the mother of that people, had indeed drunk the cup of the Lord's fury, and wrung out the very dregs of it. The terrible effects of his indignation, against that devoted city, are represented by those of a poisoned or medicated potion, which a criminal was obliged to drink off; and which produced rage, despair, and anguish, or trembling and fainting. In this condition none of her children were at hand, or able to lead, uphold, or take care of her. That is, the most desolating and stupendous judgments would be poured out upon Jerusalem, by pestilence, discord, famine, and the Roman sword; none of the neighbours would sympathize with the poor Jews, or attempt to comfort them; but would rather insult over, and enhance, their miseries. Nor would they be able to help themselves or defend their city; but they would lie fainting and dying, by multitudes, at the head of every street: and continuing unhumbled and untamed, they would resemble the wild bull, when taken in the hunter's toils, furiously struggling to extricate himself, and only entangling himself the more. Thus would they suffer by the furious rebuke of the Lord, for rejecting and crucifying their promised Messiah. This seems to relate immediately to the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the miseries that attended that awful event. But the calamities of the Jews continue to this day: and they yet remain unhumbled under them: which circumstance shows that they, and not persecuted Christians, are here primarily intended. 'Two things: that 'is, desolation by famine, and destruction by the sword.' (Bp. Lowth.)

V. 21—23. The afflicted Jews, who have been so long made drunken by temporal and spiritual judgments, more than with wine, or in a more stupifying manner, are here encouraged to expect deliverance. Mercy is yet in store for the nation, for their fathers' sake. The Lord will yet plead their cause, and punish their oppressors, who have so long treated them with equal cruelty and indignity; trampling them down as the mire in the streets, and attempting to domineer over their souls as well as their bodies. It is well known, that in those countries where the inquisition is established, numbers of Jews dissemble their religion to escape its cruelties; yet they abjectly submit to be thus trampled on, for gain by traffick there; and this forms a remarkable accomplishment of the prophecy. Neither the obstinacy, nor the sufferings, of the Jews at Babylon were equal to what they have been since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans: the scene of the prophecy leads us to this interpretation: and those popish countries, where they have been most grievously oppressed, will hereafter be punished with similar severity.—Notes, xxxiv. Rev. xviii. xix.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

The consolations of the Gospel are proposed to men, not by name, but by character: and from the first dawnings of divine life in the soul, till its completion in glory, the true believer, and he alone, "follows after righteousness "and seeks the LORD." As it is profitable to consider from what small and unpromising beginnings the blessing of God hath increased and enlarged the Church hitherto, and revived pure religion when it appeared almost expiring; so it is very useful for believers to consider frequently, "the rock whence they were hewn, and the hole of the "pit whence they were digged." We should seriously reflect upon our natural depravity, guilt, and misery: upon the enmity and hardness of our hearts, the rebellion of our wills, the pollution of our imaginations and desires, and the crimes of our lives past: we should recollect the bad habits we had contracted, through an early entrance on and a long continuance in sin; the ungodly connexions we had formed, the prejudices we had imbibed, and all the circumstances peculiar to us, which tended to aggravate our guilt, and to render our conversion improbable: and we should consider how we struggled against conviction, and would gladly have quieted our consciences without parting with our sins, or without accepting the salvation of Christ. These reviews powerfully tend to keep the heart humble, and the conscience awake and tender; they repress boastings and complaints, and excite thankfulness to him that hath made us to differ; they are suited to satisfy the discouraged believer, that a saving change hath taken place, and to animate his hopes and prayers for all that yet remains to be done in and for him; they make Christ more precious to our souls; and give energy to our attempts and prayers for the conversion of ungodly relatives, and for that of sinners all around us. Let us then frequently make such reviews, that we may renew our repentance, our joyful praises, and our earnest supplications; that our souls may become like the garden of the Lord, being filled with all the "fruits of righteousness, which are through Jesus "Christ, to the glory of God:" and that we may be, as it were in miniature, what the Church on earth will shortly become; and possess an internal evidence of the power of our God to effect that glorious change in the state of the visible Church and of the world; as well as an earnest of that further change which must yet take place in our bodies and souls, previous to our full enjoyment of that Paradise of God, where only joy and gladness shall be found, thanksgiving and the voice of melody; and from which sorrow and mourning shall flee away. Our meditation should also be extended to the former state of this our most favoured nation: blessed be God, that the Gospel of Christ hath come, and doth rest, amongst us for the light of our souls; "his righteousness is brought nigh, "his salvation is gone forth" in the midst of us: he is revealed as our Lawgiver and Judge, and he is become the Righteousness and Salvation of those that trust in and wait for him. Let us then rely on his merits, his grace, and power, and receive the law from his hands, as the rule of our obedience: and thus we shall be safe and happy, when the earth and all its works shall be worn out and burnt up; for "his salvation shall be for ever, and his righte-"ousness shall not be abolished." But if we would expect that solemn season with comfort, and have confidence in death and judgment, we must press forward in the ways of God, that having his law in our hearts, we may know our interest in his righteousness. Then we need fear no enemy or catastrophe: our reverential fear of God, and our gracious dread and abhorrence of sin, will arm us against the ensnaring fear of man; and it is our infirmity and fault, if we fear the revilings or rage of any man or set of men, who despise and hate us for the sake of Christ and his righteousness: seeing He is our ever-present and all-sufficient Protector. We can indeed expect no other than reproach in this wicked world: but our persecutors will soon die and perish. Should we be cut off by their rage, or die before them, we shall soon be out of their reach; and if we are spared, they will soon lose their power of molesting us. The cause of Christ survives one generation of opposers after another: and the believer will survive all his revilers, and enjoy his portion whilst they are in outer darkness. Let us then combat our fears, and give up ourselves unto prayer: and let us take courage in reviewing the wonders God performed for his Church of old.

V. 9—23.

We Christians may not only plead with God, that He divided the Red Sea, and destroyed the Egyptians to deliver Israel; but we may advert to the more glorious triumphs of his grace, at the day of Pentecost, and afterwards in the conversion of unnumbered multitudes to Him, whom they just before had crucified, and who, being risen again and ascended into heaven, poured out his Spirit to work the astonishing change. Compared with those glorious days, the Arm of the Lord seems now to sleep; but he only waits to be awakened by our fervent prayers. He will yet put on strength as in ancient days; He will destroy the power of Antichrist, and bind up the old dragon that hath hitherto deceived the nations. Then the redeemed of the Lord shall be delivered from captivity, Zion shall resound with songs of praise, and their gladness on earth shall form a sweet antepast to the everlasting joy of heaven. Though our lot is not cast in this happy period, yet the Lord is our Comforter, if indeed we be Christians: and should we then think ourselves so defenceless as to fear a man that shall die? Surely this must arise from our unbelief, and forgetfulness of "the LORD our Maker, who hath "stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the "earth;" and we are very reprehensible for being solicitous continually every day, because of the prevalence of infidelity and impiety, as if the enemies of godliness were ready to complete its ruin. The case is far otherwise: they are compassing their own perdition, and ere long their place shall know them no more. Let us then make haste to escape the confines of sin, and to return from our state of distance and banishment from God: but let us wait patiently our time of deliverance from oppression and calamities, assured that the Lord will hasten it in due season. If we be saved by Jesus from the pit of hell, He will not let us perish in any other pit; and our bread cannot fail if we have learned to feed upon the Bread of life: our bondage and exile on earth will soon end; our souls be rescued from the prison of our sinful bodies, and our bodies at length redeemed from the bondage of corruption, and so shall we be ever with the Lord. Let us then rest our souls on his words; that having been planted as trees of righteousness in his courts below, we shall at length be transplanted to heaven, there to flourish for ever in that garden of the Lord. Nor should they despair, who have here drunk the deepest of the cup of the Lord's indignation; for his severest judgments often introduce his tenderest compassions. Yet as long as men are hardened, stupified, or rendered outrageous or desperate by afflictions; there is little appearance of a happy event to them. When the wrath of God rests upon transgressors, no children or friends can comfort them; and all their efforts to extricate themselves, involve them in deeper guilt and misery. Let sinners then remember these things, and learn by their sufferings to submit to God, to confess their crimes, to acknowledge his justice, and to seek his mercy. Let us all recollect, that our rebellious murmurs tend only to increase and prolong our sorrows; let us look on the poor Jews with compassion, and endeavour to administer to their comfort, and not add to their miseries; and above all, let us pray for and seek their conversion. And let those powerful tyrants, who lord it over that people or any others; who enslave their bodies, or usurp authority over their consciences, remember, that the Lord will plead their cause, and punish their impenitent oppressors, with equal or greater misery and contempt, either in this world, or in that which is to come.

2 [e] Shake thyself from the dust; arise, and sit down, O Jerusalem: [f] loose thyself from the bands of thy neck, O captive daughter of Zion.

3 For thus saith the LORD, [g] Ye have sold yourselves for nought; and ye shall be redeemed without money.

4 For thus saith the Lord GOD, [h] my people went down aforetime into Egypt to sojourn there; and [i] the Assyrian oppressed them, [k] without cause.

NOTES.

CHAP. LII. V. 1. The latter part of the preceding chapter describes the desolations of Jerusalem by the Romans, and the miseries of the Jews to this day, more exactly than either those inflicted by the Chaldeans, or by Antiochus Epiphanes, which were of short continuance; and this chapter is evidently a continuation of the subject. There seems therefore to be no good reason to restrict the interpretation to the deliverance of the Jews from Babylon. We admit that the sacred writer treats his subject as a prophet and a poet, and not as an orator or historian: yet some degree of method, and some order in the series of his predictions, may be expected, as well in his writings as in those of the other prophets. He had spoken of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib; and then of the return of the Jews from Babylon; intermingling predictions of more spiritual and generally interesting events. But nothing can be supposed more interesting than the future restoration of the Jews into the Church; no event is more evidently predicted in Scripture; and the Jews generally expect the termination of their present miseries; though they think that it will be effected by the advent of the Messiah, whom they suppose not yet come. This event is far more intimately connected with those things, that relate to the person and work of Christ, than the deliverance from Babylon was; and it is so agreeable to the context, that I apprehend it ought not to be overlooked in explaining this passage. The Church had called upon her Redeemer, as the Arm of the Lord, to awake and put on strength for her deliverance; here she is called upon to awake and to be strong in the Lord, that she may apprehend that liberty, which was preparing for her. She is represented as a sorrowful woman, and called Zion, Jerusalem, the holy city: but she is exhorted to put on her beautiful garments as a rejoicing bride; being assured that the uncircumcised and unclean should no more enter into her, as the Chaldeans had done. (Marg. Ref.) But with what propriety could this be addressed to Jerusalem after the captivity? Antiochus Epiphanes soon profaned the city and temple, by every method which his impious cruelty could devise: after that event Pompey the Roman general took possession of the city, and committed many profanations: and at length the city and whole nation, as unclean, were given up into the hands of the uncircumcised Romans, to be utterly profaned and desolated. The New Testament Church therefore must chiefly be intended, and probably with especial reference to its last and purest ages; for there are intimations given, that after the termination of the anti-christian tyranny, the restoration of the Jews, and the fulness of the Gentiles being brought in; the Church shall continue in permanent peace and purity, till the eve of the general judgment: then indeed some apostacies will take place, and the apostate nations shall make war upon the city of God; but they shall fail of success and perish in the attempt: (Notes, Rev. xx. 7—15.)

V. 2, 3. The Church is here represented as trampled in the dust, (li. 23.) but she is called upon to arise and shake herself from her dust, to sit down as a queen upon a throne, and to lay aside all the badges of her former servitude. The Jews indeed had been sold into bondage for those sins, which could in no sense profit them, and they might be said to have sold themselves for nought; and all the calamities of the Christian church have been righteous visitations for her sins: and the Lord was about to redeem them by his power, without paying their oppressors any ransom for them. Cyrus extorted the power over the Jews from their oppressors, and then freely liberated them: and this may perhaps be an exact prefiguration of the future deliverance of the church. The price paid by our Redeemer for our salvation, was not silver, or gold, or corruptible things, but his own precious blood.

V. 4—6. The Egyptians ungratefully and unjustly enslaved the Israelites, when they went down to sojourn among them; and the Assyrians afterwards oppressed them without any provocation; but the Lord pleaded their cause and rescued them. Thus he afterwards delivered them from the Chaldeans; and he will save his church from all her unrighteous oppressors. He hath nothing to do with their persecutors, nor any profit from their sufferings. They, who from age to age ruled over his people, have made them to howl by their cruel oppressions, and have then insulted them, and blasphemed the name of their God, as if he could not deliver them. Therefore his own glory required him to interpose; and he would let his people know his power, truth, and love; and that He, even JEHOVAH himself, had spoken all these predictions, of which under their anguish of spirit they had been tempted to doubt. Perhaps some intimation is here given, that the Jews shall in that day know, that he, who spake to them as their Messiah, and whom they despised and crucified, was indeed their God and King.

V. 7, 8. The proclamation of Cyrus circulated by messengers into every place, and notified by signals on the tops of the mountains, was but a feeble emblem of that grand event to which the apostle appropriates this passage; namely, the preaching of the Gospel to the nations of the earth. When men know their own situation and that of the world, the feet of those who bring these good tidings appear beautiful; that is, the meanest of them: it may also intimate their holy walk and conversation. They bring good news from heaven of pardon, peace, and salvation; and say to Zion, thy God reigneth. He rules the world with invincible power, who is Zion's God and Saviour. The watchmen may be the same, as the messengers of glad tidings; evangelists, or such as wait to receive and circulate the joyful sound. Whilst they cry aloud, that all may hear, they join glad hallelujahs with their invitations: the divine light then shines so clear, that they see eye to eye, with open face, as of one mind and judgment, and very distinctly. I apprehend this is not to be restricted to any particular period, but is a general declaration of the means, by which all the predicted events, as far as they relate to spiritual redemption, are to be accomplished. In proportion as the faithful preaching of the Gospel is vouchsafed, true religion will be diffused and flourish. 'The ideas are, in 'their full extent, evangelical: and accordingly St. Paul 'has, with the utmost propriety, applied this passage to 'the preaching of the Gospel.' The tidings here to be "proclaimed, "Thy God, O Zion, reigneth," are the same "that John Baptist, and that Christ himself published;—"The kingdom of heaven is at hand." (Bp. Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 9, 10. The incorporation of the Gentile converts with the believing Jews, in the primitive times, replenished the waste places of Jerusalem, and caused great joy to all the faithful servants of God. Thus the Lord made bare his holy arm, in the eyes of the nations, to subject the worshippers of idols to himself: but when the whole visible Church shall be full of true religion, the emphasis of this passage will be more fully answered, and this will make way, literally, for "all the ends of the earth to see "the salvation of our God." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. Here the return of the Jews from Babylon is alluded to; but greater things are evidently prefigured. When leave was given them to return, the Lord commanded their departure; and that no attachment to any object, in that unclean and devoted city, should stay them: and they who carried back the sacred vessels, were to be peculiarly careful not to contract ritual or moral uncleanness. They must not needlessly delay their departure; yet neither should they improperly hasten it, as if they were fleeing from their enemies: for they would have full liberty to return home, and the Lord would guide and protect them on every side, through the whole journey. St. Paul applies part of this to the separation of sinners from idolatry and worldly lusts and connexions: (1 Cor. vi. 14—18.) and a similar command and caution are given to believers to come out from the New Testament-Babylon. (Rev. xviii. 4.)

V. 13—15. These verses introduce another subject, and properly belong to the next chapter. 'The deliverance 'of the Jews from Babylon; that of the Gentiles from 'their miserable state of ignorance and idolatry; and 'that of mankind from the captivity of sin and death, 'have a close connexion with each other;' 'and the two 'latter are shadowed out under the image of the former.—'They are covered by it as a veil, which, however, is 'transparent, and suffers them to appear through it.—'The restoration of the Jews, the call of the Gentiles, 'the redemption by Messiah, have hitherto been handled 'interchangeably and alternately: but here Babylon is at 'once dropped, and hardly ever comes in sight again.—'The prophet's views are almost wholly engrossed by the 'superior part of his subject.' (Bp. Lowth.) The Lord here speaks of his servant the Messiah, the Alpha and Omega, in all these transactions, and in every thing else. He would fulfil his whole undertaking with consummate wisdom; and his exaltation in heaven, and his glory on earth also, would be very high. Yet his previous abasement would be proportionable: many would behold his sufferings with astonishment, and be offended by them. His visage would be marred by sorrow and shame, with wounds and blood, by being spit upon, and crowned with thorns, and treated with indignity more than any man's ever was; and he would appear more base than any of the human species: yet he would in consequence "sprinkle "many nations," alluding to the ceremonial law, with his atoning blood, and by the pouring out of his Spirit, as purifying water, of which baptism would be the outward and visible sign. (Marg. Ref.) Opposing kings would at length be silenced by fear and astonishment, or won over to the faith; for they would see and consider such things, as they before had not heard of, or been acquainted with.—'This is the King Messiah, who shall be exalted above 'Abraham, and exalted above Moses, and be high above 'the angels of the ministry.' (Misdrach-Tenctuma, an ancient Jewish gloss on this passage.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6.

The promises of God should invigorate our efforts, to obtain the proposed blessings; and to promote the purity, peace, and enlargement of the Church, which they teach us to expect. Whilst we call on the Lord to awake and put on strength, for our help and salvation; we should attend to his exhortation to bestir ourselves in doing our duty. At his call the sinner awakes from the fatal sleep of sin and delusive dreams of earthly felicity, and discovers his abject, wretched, and enslaved condition; by his help he arises from the dust, shakes off his sloth and dejection, breaks off his fetters, puts off the old corrupt nature, and puts on Christ for righteousness and sanctification. Then he appears before God in his beautiful garments; his holy conversation shows him to men also, a new creature; and being thus delivered from the bondage of corruption, sin shall no more have dominion over him. Multitudes of the uncircumcised in heart and unclean in life, are within the visible Church; but none such are citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, or can find admission into the holy city of our God above. We should therefore be diligent in "cleans-"ing ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, and "in perfecting holiness in the fear of God." The freeness of his salvation gives us abundant encouragement in pursuing this path: and when we consider how unprofitable, yea, how pernicious to our temporal comfort, those sins are, by which men incur condemnation and enslave their souls; we shall the more value that redemption, which Christ hath made, "not by corruptible things, as silver "and gold, but by his own most precious blood." We should also seek complete victory over every sin, recollecting, that the glory of God as much requires the sanctification of every Christian, as it doth the deliverance of his harmless people from those oppressors, that harass them and blaspheme his holy name. And when the Lord's promises are performed to us, we obtain an additional assurance, that he indeed spake them, and an experimental knowledge of his mercy and truth, and all his glorious attributes.

V. 7—15.

All blessings come to us sinners, by means of the Gospel; we should therefore value and be thankful for that distinguishing advantage, above any temporal good. The meanest faithful minister, who brings the joyful tidings of peace and salvation, should be welcomed and respected; his footsteps should be marked and followed, and his doctrine attended to. Ministers should proclaim in the most open manner their joyful message; and endeavour so to walk, as to show the holy tendency of their doctrine. As those that watch for men's souls, they should cry aloud, and be very earnest in circulating the Gospel of salvation; and their contented thankful frame of mind, ever disposed to praise and rejoice in God, should make it plain, that they are happy, and want to render their neighbours happy with them. They should also pray continually for a more abundant supply of the Spirit of wisdom and love, that they may all "see eye to eye;" and that unnatural divisions, and acrimonious disputes, may no longer disgrace the Gospel of peace. It behooves all of us to pray continually, that many such messengers of salvation may be sent forth, and welcomed by the nations of the earth; that Zion's God, who reigneth on a throne of grace, may be made known and served by them; that the waste places of Jerusalem may rejoice, and the Church be redeemed from thraldom; that so "the LORD may make bare his holy arm "in the eyes of all the nations; and that all the ends of "the earth may see his salvation." In the mean time, they, who are favoured with the Gospel, are called to depart from sin, to separate from the world, to renounce every kind of idolatry and superstition, and to touch no unclean thing; and they who minister in sacred things should be peculiarly watchful against all appearance of evil. This should not be thought impracticable, for no power on earth or in hell can obstruct our escape from the dominion of sin and Satan, if we desire to return to God, and to become his redeemed servants. He will be our Guide and Guard, and our way will be safe, and made plain before us.—Yet we must expect to meet with some of the difficulties,

NOTES.

CHAP. LIII. V. 1. 'This chapter declares the circumstances of our Saviour's sufferings so exactly, that it 'forms rather a history of his passion, than a prophecy. 'And it is so undeniable a proof of the truth of Christianity, that the bare reading of it, comparing it with the 'Gospel-history, hath converted some infidels. (Lowth.) The prophet goes on, from mentioning the great success of the Gospel among the Gentiles at the close of the preceding chapter, to predict the unbelief of the Jews. Apostles and evangelists, in the primitive times, may be considered as complaining of their ill success, or wondering at it: or the prophet, as a Jew, and speaking in his own name and that of the other prophets, anticipated with astonishment and sorrow, this conduct of his nation. When John Baptist, Christ himself, his apostles, and others proclaimed the interesting report, that the long expected Messiah was come; though he most exactly answered to the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, and authenticated his mission by most stupendous miracles; yet few in comparison believed the report, and they were generally of the lowest and most despised persons in the nation. For this "Arm of the LORD," that was employed to redeem his people, was not revealed to them, even when he lived among them: because they were blinded by prejudice, and because they were for their sins judicially left destitute of that powerful operation of God's Spirit upon their minds, by which believers were enabled to see the Saviour's glory, "as of the only Begotten of the Father, full of grace and "truth." (Marg. Ref.)

V. 2, 3. The wickedness of the Jews induced them to reject Christ: but various circumstances proved occasions of it. They expected the Messiah to spring from the avowed heir of king David, and to be openly known as born and educated at Bethlehem; and to come forth in a splendid manner, as a King and a Conqueror. But he was the son of a poor unnoticed virgin, and the reputed son of a carpenter, who were not generally known to be descended from David: he was brought up at Nazareth, and his birth at Bethlehem had either been unnoticed, or was forgotten: he grew up and lived a long time in obscurity, probably working as a carpenter; he then appeared as a poor man, "who had not where to lay his head," and attended by a few poor fishermen: and he was an itinerant teacher, unauthorized by the priests and scribes. Thus instead of a Plant of renown, he grew up before God, in such a manner, that he appeared as a tender shoot, whose root was in a dry ground, where it was never likely to come to any thing. So that, notwithstanding the wisdom and grace of his words, the power of his miracles, and the holy beauty of his character, the Jews could find no form or comeliness in him, for which they should desire and welcome him as their Messiah. He was therefore generally despised and rejected by them: this contempt and reproach further confirmed the prejudices of the people against him; and every thing concurred in rendering him a man of sorrows and intimately acquainted with grief. The people hid their faces from him, as ashamed to own him; until at length his disciples denied or forsook him, and the Jews, as with one consent, preferred a murderer to him. Or he hid his face, as one covered with confusion, or as concealing his glory from them under this external abasement: so that in every way he was deemed undeserving of notice or estimation. 'Some of the ancient fathers, from this text, 'concluded our Saviour to have been deformed, an opinion 'in my judgment not at all probable: in the following 'centuries, a quite contrary notion was advanced, that 'Christ was a person of extraordinary comeliness. We 'may conclude from these contrary opinions, that the setting up of the image, or picture of Christ, was no part 'of religious worship in the early ages of Christianity.'—(Lowth.)

7 He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, [q] yet he opened not his mouth: [r] he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.

8 ¶ He was taken * from prison and from judgment: and [s] who shall declare his generation? for he was [t] cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was † he stricken.

9 And he [u] made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his ‡ death; because he had done no violence, neither was any [x] deceit in his mouth.

V. 4—6. The prophet, in the name of all believers in every age, here breaks forth in admiration of the love of Christ, and of the mystery of his vicarious sufferings. As every kind of disease and misery springs from sin; so when Christ endured hardship in alleviating these miseries, it might properly be considered as a fulfilment of this prophecy, and a part of his general design. (Notes, Matt. viii. 17.) He endured our griefs and sorrows, becoming a sufferer to redeem us from eternal sufferings: and this, which should for ever endear him to mankind, caused the Jews to mistake his character, and to suppose that he was smitten of God as a most atrocious sinner; as Job's friends construed his calamities into a proof of his undetected guilt. He was indeed wounded, but it was not for his own, but for our, transgressions: he was crushed with most intense agonies of body and soul, but it was for our iniquities. To purchase our peace with God, he that was Holy and Beloved, consented to bear our punishment, as if it had been a personal chastisement: and his stripes avail for the pardon and healing, or sanctification, of our souls. All the elect people of God are brought to confess, that they had wandered from God, as sheep from the fold, and must have been devoured by Satan the roaring lion, if the good Shepherd had not come to seek them: every one of them had turned into that devious path which was congenial to his depraved inclination; but all had added the guilt of rebellion, to the folly of forsaking their only Protector. So that the justice of God must be satisfied, before the criminals could be again received into his favour and under his care: and therefore JEHOVAH laid, or caused to meet, upon Christ the surety, not the punishment only, but the iniquity of them all, imputing it to him, and requiring of him satisfaction for it. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 7. "More literally, it was exacted, and he answered." Our debt was exacted of our Surety, and he became answerable for it. And therefore he opened not his mouth to plead for himself, but stood speechless before man's tribunal, that he might have a prevailing plea before that of God. He was led patient, gentle, and innocent, like a lamb to be slaughtered for the food, or sacrificed for the offences, of others; and like a sheep when deprived of its fleece, that others may be clothed with it. (Note, Acts viii. 32—35.)

V. 8. The chief priests and scribes did not cast our Lord into prison, and then after a time give him a fair trial, according to law and custom: but without delay they delivered him to Pilate, and urged his immediate execution. Thus "he was taken from prison," (being in confinement only a few hours,) "and from judgment: and who shall "declare his generation?" The ancient fathers generally interpreted this of his miraculous conception, or his eternal generation. Who shall declare his descent from David, and his birth at Bethlehem the city of David? Who shall show, that he was not only the Son of David, but the only begotten Son of God. But the original word for generation, is seldom, if ever, used in this sense: so that modern interpreters generally dissent from the ancients: and some render it, "His manner of life who shall de-"clare?" None was called, or admitted, to bear witness to his character, as it was customary in criminal causes. But as the word rendered generation, commonly means the time during which an individual, or a number of contemporaries live; the passage may mean, 'Who shall de-'clare, how long his age shall last?' 'Though he died 'for sin, yet after his resurrection he shall live for ever.' "I am he, that liveth, and was dead, and behold I am "alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell, "and of death." Other kings and priests, &c. finished their course by death; but he is a King, and a high Priest for ever. But who stood forward, at his crucifixion to declare this? For it pleased God that he should "be cut "off out of the land of the living," in this violent manner; because, "for the transgression of his people," "the "stroke," or punishment, "was on him."

V. 9, 10. "A grave was appointed for him with the "wicked; but he was with the rich at his death," (or in his tomb, or elevated place, as the word regularly derived from another root may mean:) "because he," &c. As our Lord was crucified between two thieves, it was doubtless intended that he should be buried with them. Thus "his "grave was appointed with the wicked;" but Joseph of Arimathea came and asked for his body, and Pilate, convinced that he had committed no crime, readily granted Joseph's request. Thus "he was with the rich at his death," that is, till his resurrection: and this took place, contrary to the intention of his enemies, "because he had done no violence," &c. for Joseph would scarcely have requested, and probably Pilate would not have consented, to deliver up the body of a crucified malefactor. The designed obscurity of the prophecy renders its exact accomplishment the more remarkable. Some connect the latter clause with what follows, and render it; "Though he had done," &c.; yet it "pleased the LORD," he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth; so that Pilate, when he delivered him to be crucified, declared that he found no fault in him: yet it pleased the Lord himself to bruise him; the Father who was well pleased in him, yet took pleasure in bruising him with anguish of spirit; because this was for the display of his own glory and the honour of his law. So that he not only permitted his enemies cruelly to insult and torment him: but he put him to grief by his own hand, and made "his soul exceedingly sorrowful, even unto "death." Thus his soul, or life, was made an offering for sin: not only was his blood shed, as that of the sacrifices used to be, but he endured the feeling of the wrath of God due to our sins, which the fire from heaven, consuming on the altar the inwards or bodies of the sacrifices, typified. In consequence of this it was foretold, that he would see a numerous spiritual offspring, the fruit of all his toil and pain: for he would rise again from the dead, and then prolong his days; and the pleasure of the Lord, in converting and saving sinners, would prosper in his powerful and gracious hands. This is a prediction of his resurrection and subsequent glory, equally clear with that of his sufferings. The interpretation of the clause, "it pleased the "Lord to bruise him," as given by many expositors, has been objected to; because the Septuagint does not use the same word in translating this passage, with which the Evangelist records the voice from heaven, "This is my "beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." But when it is duly considered, that the Hebrew word is frequently used for the highest kind and degree of satisfaction; the objection must vanish. (xlii. 21. lxii. 4. Gen. xxxiv. 19. Num. xiv. 8. Mic. vii. 18.) 'Chaphets notes the highest 'content that may be, to wit, delight; it is the same with 'εὐδοκεῖν.' (Leigh.)

V. 11, 12. JEHOVAH here declares that Christ should see that abundant effect of his agonies and death, "the "travail of his soul," that he would be fully satisfied and rejoice in it. His Gospel would make known his person, love, righteousness, atonement, and salvation; and thus "by the knowledge of him," the Messiah "would justify "many," "having borne their sins in his own body on "the tree." Because he had poured out his soul unto death, and, though perfectly righteous, had submitted to be numbered with transgressors or malefactors, and to bear the sins of many, that he might become their Intercessor: therefore the Father would surely grant unto him a large multitude of sinners to be saved and ruled by him, who before were the slaves of Satan, and must have continued to belong to that potent enemy of God and man; and he should have all power in heaven and earth, to enable him to rescue all, that had been given to him, and to complete their salvation. (Marg. Ref.) This prophecy, delivered at least seven hundred years before the birth of Christ, and coinciding so exactly with the history of his sufferings and death; the reasons of them, as recorded and assigned in the New Testament; and the effect of them, as it hath been evidently produced for almost eighteen hundred years, constitute a most unanswerable demonstration of the truth of the Scriptures, and of the great doctrines of the Gospel. Nor is this in the least invalidated by the infidelity of the Jews, who deeming this to be the word of God by Isaiah, can see nothing of Jesus in it; but adopt the grossest absurdities imaginable, in order to make out some other interpretations; for the veil is upon their hearts, but when they shall be turned to the Lord, it shall be taken away. Indeed their unbelief also, is most expressly predicted, at the opening of the chapter: so that it may "turn to us "for a testimony."

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—7.

Whilst every vague, unimportant, and improbable report is greedily drunk in by the absurd credulity of mankind; the most interesting and completely authenticated report of salvation for sinners, through the incarnate Son of God, is almost universally rejected or disregarded! We have to this day cause to complain and to wonder, that so few believe it; and we may profitably inquire, who they are that do? Not many of the noble, the wealthy, the learned of the world; not all, who are called by the name of Christ, and profess his religion; not the covetous, the sensual, the proud and ambitious, the cruel and oppressive: but a few, that are poor in spirit, mourning for sin, renouncing the world, devoted to God, following after holiness, meek, peaceable, forgiving, inoffensive, and benevolent; yet despised and reviled as their Saviour was. To them Christ, the Power of God and the Wisdom of God, hath been made known; his spirit hath enlightened their minds and humbled their hearts; and thus they have seen his glory, and highly value his salvation. To others the whole appears contemptible; the preaching of his cross is foolishness; and a life of obedience to his precepts is madness or preciseness, a want of taste and spirit, the result of bigotry and fanaticism, and a certain indication of a weak understanding and a narrow mind! They "see no "form or comeliness" in the character of Christ, as delineated in Scripture, and exemplified by his true disciples; nor is there any excellency in him, that they should desire and seek after him: he is still despised in his people and rejected of men, as to his doctrine and authority. We may indeed well endure our lighter sufferings: If He have taught us to esteem all things but loss for him, and to love him who hath so loved us. He willingly bore our griefs when we were enemies, and shall we repine at bearing our cross for the sake of such a generous Friend? Should we be treated as the vilest of mankind, and counted the peculiar objects of the divine abhorrence; let us remember him, "that endured the contradiction of sinners against "himself, lest we be weary and faint in our minds." Let us often retire in contemplation to Gethsemane and Golgotha: and whilst we survey the sufferings of the Son of God, let us review our long catalogue of former and latter transgressions, and consider him as scourged, wounded, bruised, insulted, and crucified; as agonizing, bleeding, and dying, under the load of our guilt. Thus we shall learn to hate and to mortify sin: we shall understand our obligations to our gracious Friend, and be constrained by love to live to his glory. In this we are all concerned; for we have all gone astray from God, though in different ways; and we must all have perished, had not the good Shepherd come to seek and save us, and willingly borne the load of our iniquity, which would have been too heavy for us to bear. Our debt was exacted of him, and he paid the uttermost farthing; and in doing this, he was led as a lamb to the slaughter: and shall we, who deserve the final wrath of God, be impatient, like a wild bull in a net, under our light afflictions? Let us then prove, that we rely on his atonement alone, by copying his example of meekness and submission, however we may be chastised of God, or oppressed by men.

V. 3.—12.

We may comfortably leave all the circumstances of our death to our merciful Saviour: he hath sanctified every method of dying and every place of sepulture, whether we make our grave with the wicked, or be with the rich and honourable in our death. However we may suffer with evil doers; yet if we do no violence and speak no guile, nothing can hurt us. If it should please the Lord to prove our faith and patience, by grievous and complicated distresses, or to cut us off by sudden or violent death; the Redeemer's atoning sufferings will secure a happy event to us, and to all those who bear his image and partake of his Spirit. Being now risen from the dead, and ever living to carry on his work and plead our cause; "the pleasure of "the Father prospereth in his hand." Here is laid the firm foundation for the trembling sinner to rest his soul upon: for he beholds the true penitent, who humbly ventures nigh to seek an interest in his atoning blood by faith in his name, with that affection and complacency, with which the tender mother eyes her new-born infant, the fruit and recompense of all her anguish; He then "sees of "the travail of his soul and is satisfied." These are the trophies of his victory, the purchase of his blood, the monuments of his grace; for this he poured out his soul unto death, and was numbered with transgressors: for this he continually intercedeth and prevaileth; thus he destroyeth the works of the devil, and rescueth the prey from the bands of that mighty one. Let us bless the Lord for the knowledge of Christ, by which numbers in every age are justified: let us pray and endeavour, that it may be extended to all our fellow sinners: and let us think no labour, hardship, or expense too great, by which we may promote that cause, for which the Redeemer shed his blood. Thus we shall prove ourselves partakers of his salvation, and make an acceptable return of gratitude for his unspeakable love.

NOTES.

CHAP. LIV. V. 1. The connexion and language of this chapter lead our thoughts to Gospel times, with very little reference to previous deliverances. The Jewish Church is here represented as a married woman, who, (like Sarah,) had long continued barren. Comparatively few real believers, the children of God and of the Church, had been raised up among the Jews. And about the time of Christ's coming, Pharisaical formality, Sadducean infidelity, or open impiety, were become almost universal. This was a matter of grief to the small remnant of believers: but the coming of Christ would introduce better times. Though the nation in general rejected him, and were cast off; yet many children were born unto the Church, the Gentile converts were adopted into her family: and those nations that had been destitute of ordinances, and strangers to the covenants of promise, produced a larger increase of true believers, than the Jewish nation, that had been married to the Lord by their national covenant and distinguished advantages. As these were all the true children of the Church, she was to break forth into loud songs of joyful praise; notwithstanding the unbelief and rejection of that nation, of which her family had hitherto chiefly consisted. (Marg. Ref. Notes, Gal. iv. 21—31.)

V. 2, 3. The Church is still addressed as a matron, who with her small family resided in a tent: but this would soon be found incapable of containing all her children. She must therefore prepare to occupy more room, and make larger curtains and longer cords: and as perpetuity, as well as enlargement, was to distinguish the Christian dispensation, she must also strengthen the stakes on which the curtains were suspended. And she need not fear making too large preparations: for vast accessions were to be expected; and her family would be so increased, that it would diffuse itself on every side, and at length occupy the countries and cities, that had been devoted to idolatry, and strangers to the name and worship of JEHOVAH.

V. 4, 5. The Church, in her youth, had been basely enslaved in Egypt; afterwards she had been greatly defiled by idolatries and debased by grievous oppressions; she also lay under the reproach of barrenness, and had been put away, as if rejected for her unfaithfulness; but by the introduction of the Gospel-dispensation, and by that purity and prosperity that were intended, these reproaches would all be wiped off and forgotten; and she need no more fear being confounded by the reproach of being left forlorn and destitute as a widow. (Lam. i. 1.) For the Lord of Hosts, the Creator of the world and of the Church, would avow his relation to her as her Husband; and afford her all the protection, and show her all the kindness, which that endeared relation implies. He had all along been spoken of as the Redeemer and the Holy One of Israel; but he would at length be acknowledged and worshipped, as the God of the whole earth. Christ is the Redeemer and the Bridegroom of the Church; and he is her Creator, and the God of the whole earth. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6—10. The Church had been in the condition of a woman forsaken by her husband and grieved in spirit: having been espoused in her youth, and afterwards rejected with dislike for her misconduct: but the Lord was about to recal her into a state of more comfortable and intimate communion with him. The corruptions of the Jewish Church, the low state of religion among them, and the repeated triumphs of their enemies, as if God had quite cast them off; and the grief that these things occasioned to believers, are here intended: perhaps not without some reference to the calamities of the Christian Church during the reign of Antichrist, and that of the Jewish nation unto this day. But the frown and hiding of God's countenance, and the consequent affliction of the Church, would be only momentary compared with the duration of her peace and prosperity: his little wrath would soon be pacified; and he would gather her and her increasing number of children, with everlasting kindness and great mercies. His engagements to this effect were as irrevocable, as the covenant made with Noah, and confirmed with an oath that he would never more drown the world; for he had also sworn by himself never to be wroth with and rebuke his Church, as in times past, or so as to cast her off: his covenant of peace, the result of his tender mercies, would be more durable than the mountains, and abide in force when they should remove and be seen no more.

V. 11—14. The Church is here again considered as a woman in great distress: as a person at sea in a storm, and in danger of being ship-wrecked: or as dwelling in a tent that was ready to be overturned by a furious tempest: and in short, as bereft of all her comfort. All the persecutions and calamities of the Church, as well as the temptations, afflictions, and discouragements of believers, seem to be intended. But she is assured, that all these will end well. Instead of her mean uncomfortable tent, the Lord promises to build her a most glorious city or palace, whose foundations, windows, walls, and towers, should be formed of precious stones, most beautiful and durable. These are emblems of the light, purity, and prosperity, which the Church on earth shall at length enjoy, resembling those of heaven. (Rev. xxi. 18—22.) Numbers of the children of the Church had been uninstructed or ill-instructed; but it is promised, that all her children shall be taught of the LORD, by his Spirit, and according to his word. This may be understood of the true Israel, as distinguished from Israel according to the flesh; yet it seems to relate especially to those glorious times, which are to succeed the tribulations of the Church. (Marg. Ref.) Then her children will have great peace, both outward and inward: she shall be established in righteousness, and be delivered from oppression, and even from the fear of it.

V. 15—17. This may be considered as a general promise to the Church, through successive ages. Many assailants would combine against her; but, the Lord being on her side, they would be destroyed for her sake; or, as some understand the clause, "shall come over to thy side." He is the Creator of those that forge weapons of war, and of the great destroyers of mankind; both are in his hands, and employed or restrained at his pleasure; and he would take care, that no weapons formed against his Church should prosper, and that all her accusers and enemies should be condemned. This security and final victory are to be considered as the heritage of each of the faithful servants of the Lord: while the righteousness, in which they are justified, and the grace by which they are sanctified, are both the gift of God, and the effect of his special love.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

All that love God and man will rejoice and be thankful, when sinners are converted; for then the prayers of the Church are answered, and the sufferings of Christ are made effectual, to his glory in the salvation of souls. Frequently those places and congregations, where means and appearances of religion abound, are wretchedly destitute of the life and power of it: the Lord hath many more children in places comparatively desolate; and the Gospel is commonly most successful where it hath newly been sent.—When sinners repent and believe, they are numbered among the children of God and of the Church, and should be received by us as brethren, even though they belong not to our sect or party. Though vast multitudes have accepted of the invitations of the Gospel, there is yet room for more in the kingdom of Christ; and we should expect large accessions to the Church under the Christian dispensation, and be instant in prayer, that her seed may inherit the nations, and replenish all the dark and desolate places of the earth. Much hath already been done according to these predictions, for which we should praise the Lord: but we are still called on to enlarge the place of Zion's tabernacle, to stretch forth her curtains, and, with vast expectations, to lengthen her cords and strengthen her stakes: assured that she shall yet break forth on the right hand and on the left, till the earth be filled with truth and righteousness.—Ministers, magistrates, merchants, wealthy persons, and every description of men, may find much to do in this important concern, if they improve their talents and watch their opportunities: and we need not fear, but that God will accept our prayers and second our endeavours, when they are regulated by his precepts and promises. The believer also should discard those fears, which originate from reflecting on his evil nature or from reviewing the shame of his youth, or those former instances of unfaithfulness of which he now humbly repents. The Lord will blot out his transgressions, and wipe away his reproach, and he will never forsake any that trust in his mercy: nay, he will receive them into the most honourable and happy relation to himself: their Maker, the LORD of Hosts, the God of the whole earth, will become their Husband and Redeemer. We never can sufficiently admire this condescension, or estimate this privilege: we cannot expect too much from his love, confide too entirely in his protection, glory too much in this honour, or take too much delight in communion with this our loving friend. To form this union and to encourage our confidence, He dwells in human nature, and is called Immanuel: He shed his blood for our ransom, and endows us with all his unsearchable riches; he will cleanse us from all our sins, and adorn us with suitable decorations, and shortly take us to himself, to rejoice for ever with him in this sacred union. Let us then walk in simplicity of heart with him, centering all our affections on him, and expecting all our happiness from him.

V. 6—17.

Even real Christians often give cause of jealousy to their gracious Lord; and then he frowns, hides his face, and seems as if he would reject them according to their deservings. Then they fear being forsaken, and are grieved in spirit: but when duly humbled they seek his face, he recalls them into his presence and renews the tokens of his love. And to all, who really love and trust in him, his absence and frown are momentary: but his mercies and kindness are infinite and everlasting. He hath promised never to leave nor forsake his people: he hath formed that promise into a covenant of peace, and ratified and sealed it; and he hath confirmed it with an oath for our more complete satisfaction. He will indeed correct and rebuke his people, but he will no more cast them off, than he will again drown the world for the sins of men; and the experience of more than four thousand years evinces, that their crimes cannot provoke him to violate that irrevocable engagement. Let this encourage us to give diligence to make our calling and election sure; that when we are afflicted and tempted, we may know and be comforted by our interest in these promises; and be assured that our "light and momentary "afflictions are working for us a far more exceeding and "eternal weight of glory." But let us not forget, that all the genuine children of the Church, are "taught of the "LORD;" they desire, seek, and depend on that teaching; and they are taught by him to hate sin, to believe in Christ, and obey him; and thus they find rest and great peace to their souls. The more assured they are, that their labour will not be in vain in the Lord, the more steadfast and immoveable they are in his work. Such as are thus taught of God need fear no enemy, (except so as to watch, and pray against temptation.) Many may attempt to injure them, but God is their Protector; many may reproach them, but God is their Justifier. They are his servants and his children; and he is not only their Lord and their Father, but their Husband; and who can rise up against them with impunity? Let us then seek that "righteousness of God, which is unto, and upon all that believe;" let us beseech him to sanctify our souls, and employ us in his service: and thus we may disregard both the wasters that destroy the nations, and the weapons that are formed against the Church: and enjoy the present privileges, and expect the future heritage, of the redeemed servants of the Lord.

NOTES.

CHAP. LV. V. 1—3. The sufferings and glory of the Redeemer, and the security and happiness of his Church, having been fully declared; here follows an invitation to the sons of men to come and share these invaluable blessings. The prophet seems to personate the first preachers of the Gospel, when they went forth in the name of the Lord to compel men to come into the marriage supper, even from the highways and hedges; but Christ himself then spake and still speaks, the same things by his word and ministers: (Marg. Ref.) The blessings before mentioned were the heritage of the servants of the Lord: but here men in general are called on, by proclamation, to approach and partake of them, as men come to the waters to draw for themselves. All that thirst for pardon, grace, and salvation, are invited to come to God through Christ for them; nay, all that thirst for happiness are exhorted to seek it from Him. The blessings that he bestows are abundant like the waters; but they are precious, pleasant, and exhilarating, as wine and milk, or the most nutrimental and delicious food; and though freely bestowed, without money or price, to accommodate those who desire them, but who are conscious that they have not wherewith to purchase them; yet they are too valuable to be bought with money: at the same time they cannot be secured but by parting with whatever comes in competition with them. The Lord then expostulates with the sons of men, who waste their lives, mis-employ their powers, and weary themselves for such things as are not bread and cannot satisfy; who bestow immense pains, and sacrifice every valuable consideration, for the sake of such acquisitions, as can neither add to their present comfort, prolong their lives, or save their souls. This equally applies to the votaries of this vain and vexatious world; and to those who devise, and are very earnest about false and worthless schemes of religion. If nothing better could be had, such men might have some show of reason for their conduct; but as the Lord invites them to come, and partake of substantial good and satisfying happiness, in his favour and service; they are as unreasonable as criminal, in their wicked courses. They are therefore exhorted diligently to hearken to the Lord, to attend to his doctrine, and embrace his salvation: and thus the everlasting covenant of grace will be ratified with them; and all the mercies promised to David, and to his Seed and Antitype the Messiah, be ensured to their souls. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4, 5. 'David is in the prophets often put for 'Christ, in whom all the promises made to David are ful- 'filled.' (Jer. xxx. 9. Ez. xxxiv. 23. Hos. iii. 5.) (Lowth.) —JEHOVAH here first speaks concerning this promised Saviour; whom he had "given as a Witness to the people, "the faithful and true Witness," the Light of the Gentiles; as well as of his people Israel; (for the words are plural in the original.) The Father here speaks concerning the Messiah, the grand blessing intended by the sure mercies of David. He had appointed him to publish his will, attest his truths, and ratify his covenant; he was given to be a Leader and Forerunner of his people, to guide men into the ways of peace and holiness, and to lead them to victory and liberty; and to be their Commander, their Captain, Lawgiver, Judge, Ruler, and Protector. He then addressed Christ himself: the Jewish nation would generally refuse to have him for their Witness, Leader, and Commander: but at the call of his Gospel a holy nation would be formed under his government, who had not before been known by him as the worshippers of God; yea, many nations, that had been strangers to him, would hasten to him and become his subjects, from ardently desiring the favour of the Lord God of Israel; who had raised him from the dead, exalted him to his right hand in heaven, and sent forth his Holy Spirit with his apostles, to give success to the Gospel; and thus had glorified him, whom man despised. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 6, 7. Whilst the Gospel was preached to the Jews, God was near to them, and might be found by them: but he was about to withdraw, and then they would be left to judicial blindness. But the exhortation is equally given to others. —"God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." Jesus is "Immanuel, God with us:" "God manifested in "the flesh." Through him the Lord may be found on a throne of grace and in his holy ordinances: he is near those who hear his Gospel, and he often strives with their hearts by his Holy Spirit: but the means of grace may be withdrawn, or that influence which gives efficacy to them withheld; and life must soon terminate, and then God will no more be found by any wicked man, or be graciously near to him. Let then all that hear seize the opportunity, and seek the knowledge and favour of God without delay, by faith and prayer. (Marg. Ref.) The most wicked and unrighteous may yet obtain forgiveness: but then they must repent and forsake all their sins, especially those to which they have been most habituated: and they must also forsake their evil imaginations, desires, and devices; and no longer expect happiness in wickedness, or salvation from themselves, or in their sins; they must return to the LORD, by ceasing to rebel against him, and by becoming his loyal subjects; and in this way, they may be assured, that he will have mercy on them, and multiply pardons to them, even as they have multiplied sins against him.

V. 8, 9. The thoughts and ways of the Lord, in his dealings with sinners, are wholly different from those of men, and often contrary to them; and they are as far above them as the heavens are above the earth. His wisdom and love, in giving his only begotten Son to be the sacrifice for the sins of his enemies, and thus glorifying his justice, holiness, and law, even when showing mercy to the vilest transgressors; his method of justifying the ungodly by faith in the righteousness of Christ, and of sanctifying them by his new-creating Spirit: his way of teaching men to live sober, righteous, and godly lives, by the preaching of that free salvation, which the wise men of the world suppose to tend to licentiousness; his plan of hiding these things from the wise and prudent, and revealing them to babes; his constant readiness to pardon and save all that come, to supply all their wants, enrich them with all blessings, and fill them with peace and joy in believing, notwithstanding their former provocations: his rule of "not "calling the righteous, but sinners to repentance," and formerly his calling of the Gentiles and rejection of the Jews: these things, and numberless others, show God's thoughts and ways to be very different from man's, and infinitely more excellent. Men are apt to think the unworthiness of the object a bar to their kindness; and to reject those that are beneath them, or have been provoking, or who have been relieved before, have brought their troubles on themselves, or who are likely to be further burdensome. They are apt to despair of many descriptions of sinners, and to excuse their neglect of them, by the pretence that they are incorrigible: but it is well that the Lord does not deal with them by such rules.

12 For [b] ye shall go out with joy, and be led forth with peace: [i] the mountains and the hills shall break forth before you into singing, and all the trees of the field shall [k] clap their hands.

13 Instead [l] of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree: and it shall be to the LORD [m] for a name, for [n] an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

V. 10, 11. The Lord sends the rain and snow to water the earth, and to make the seed sown in it to vegetate, and thus to produce food for man and seed to sow again for a future crop: and he does not with-hold or recal his bounty, because many abuse it; nor can their perverseness prevent this change of the weather and course of the seasons. Thus the unbelief and opposition of the Jews should not prevent the success of the Gospel: he would perform his promises and purposes: he would accompany the Gospel with the Holy Spirit, and thus cause the seed to grow for the benefit of that and every future age. In short, his word should not return void, but accomplish his great designs, in defiance of all opposition.

V. 12, 13. Here may be some allusion to the return of the Jews from Babylon; but greater events are evidently intended. The poor prisoners of Satan set at liberty from their noisome dungeon, through the Redeemer's grace, by means of the Gospel preached to them, would go out with joy, and be led forth with peace in the way to heaven. (Note, xlix. 9—11.) Joyful praises would on that account resound on every side; as if the mountains, hills, and forests were animated to unite with angels in heaven and saints on earth, in exulting thanksgivings. When idolaters and the vilest of sinners became Christians, holy persons, worshippers of God, and useful to mankind; then the stately and useful fir-tree came in the place of the worthless thorn, and the beautiful fragrant myrtle in that of the entangling brier. These blessed effects of the Gospel are honourable to the name of God; the continuance of Christianity on earth to the end of time, and the happiness of the believer in heaven for ever, form an everlasting monument or trophy of his power and love. The conversion of the Gentiles is evidently predicted by these emblems; and likewise that of the dispersed Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—5.

All are welcome to the blessings of salvation, to whom those blessings are welcome. Sinners should therefore be loudly and earnestly invited to come to Christ, and exhorted to use the means of grace: that they who thirst for these waters of life, but fear lest such vile wretches should be excluded, may be encouraged; and that the proud, the sensual, and scornful may be left without excuse. We cannot too highly recommend the rich provisions made for our starving souls: it is our interest on any terms to make them our own; but where shall we, whose best services merit condemnation, find money or price with which to buy such invaluable blessings? Sin and misery are all we can call our own: our bodies and souls always were the Lord's just due, and every service that we can possibly perform. We already owe an immense debt, and cannot pay one farthing; our inheritance is forfeited, and we have merited condemnation: our wants are innumerable, and we have nothing wherewith to supply them. But the Lord Jesus has purchased for us every blessing; he freely bestows on every believer whatever can conduce to his present comfort or everlasting felicity; and on all those who come to ask them, with the additional favour that he would take them as his servants, and make them what he would have them to be. But though none, except those that hunger and thirst for spiritual blessings, will thus come, buy, and eat, without money and without price: yet all should be invited; because God in this way excites such desires in the hearts of men. All seek to be happy: yet most men spend money for that which is not bread, and labour for that which satisfieth not: with such we may expostulate; and whilst we show them the folly of their present conduct, we may exhort them diligently to hearken to the Saviour's voice; we may persuade them to read and meditate on his sacred word, and to seek the teaching of his Holy Spirit; to observe his directions, to accede to his invitations, and to make trial of his easy yoke. Then, and not before, they will find rest to their souls; thus, and in no other way, they "will eat that which is good, and their souls will delight "themselves in fatness." Inclining our ears to his instructions and coming to him for salvation, we obtain life and the blessings of the everlasting covenant, through the blood of its great and gracious Surety: he then becomes our Teacher, Leader, and Ruler; by him we commune with the Father, and through him our services are accepted, and our happiness is secured. He calls those that hitherto have been strangers; through grace they obey his call, and run to him to share the privileges of his redeemed people; and in their conversion and holy conversation he is glorified, and the Father is glorified in him.

V. 6—12.

Whilst the word of God proposes to us eternal salvation, "the Lord is near us, and may be found:" let all therefore who read or hear of this salvation, seek him and call upon him without delay: and let none trifle with, or abuse his plenteous mercy: but let the wicked call on him to help them, that in his strength they may forsake their ungodly ways, and exclude their polluting thoughts and desires; and let them return to the Lord by penitent faith and prayer, that they may obtain an interest in his abundant mercy and multiplied pardons. And let not any of us limit him by our rules, as if there were any sinners too hardened to be converted, or too vile to be forgiven; or as if any of them might properly be left without refuge and hope. Let the discouraged penitent remember, that "where sin hath abounded, grace much more abounds;" and let ministers and Christians observe, that the things "that are impossible with man, are possible with God." We should therefore use every means to reclaim the most desperate offenders, and to do good to those that are most distant from us, or have been most injurious to us: for the Lord's thoughts and ways are not as ours, but far above them, and more excellent than they. Assuredly the word of God, when faithfully preached, will answer the ends that he hath purposed, and will in some instances be blessed to bring sinners to repentance; and who can describe the happy change which then takes place in their state and character? Delivered from the wrath to come, and from the bondage of sin and Satan; justified by faith and reconciled unto God, the converted sinner begins to experience sweet peace in his conscience; hope animates and gratitude enlarges his heart, and love constrains him to devote himself to the service of his merciful Redeemer. Instead of a profane, contentious, selfish, or sensual wretch, the grief or temptation of all around him; behold him now patient, meek, humble, blameless, upright, benevolent, and peaceable; a kind relation, a faithful friend, a compassionate neighbour, a spiritual worshipper, a follower of Christ, an example to others, a useful member of society, and an instrument of God's glory, to diffuse the knowledge of his salvation around him, and to transmit it to the next generation! In such converts the Lord will be everlastingly glorified, and many will be unspeakably benefited by them. Well then may there be joy in heaven and in earth, when one sinner thus repenteth. How should the hopes of being instrumental in so good a work, animate our endeavours to spread the Gospel of salvation: and our prayers that such trophies of the Redeemer's victories may every where be multiplied! And how should we endeavour to be living demonstrations, that this is the genuine tendency of the Gospel; and to "let our light so "shine before men, that they may see our good works, "and glorify our heavenly Father!"

NOTES.

CHAP. LVI. V. 1, 2. The prophet doubtless was guided so to write his predictions, as might render them useful to the Jews, in his own and in after times, and to the Church in every age. We may therefore consider this as an exhortation to the Jews in Babylon, or in any other of their calamities, to wait and prepare for deliverance, by attending to the precepts and ordinances of God. But as it here stands, it seems to be equivalent to the call of John Baptist: "Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is "at hand." The attention of the Jews, about the time of Christ, was almost entirely taken up with trivial observances, to the neglect of the weightier matters of the law; and their formality, hypocrisy, iniquity, and presumptuous confidence in external privileges, led them to reject his salvation, of which they neither perceived the necessity, nor understood the nature. The sermon of Christ upon the mount, and the general tenour of his preaching, were very similar to this address; and, by showing the spiritual nature of true religion, both tended to discover to them their need of mercy and grace, and to lead them to follow after holiness. In like manner, the Lord here assures the Jews, that his salvation approached, his promises were about to be fulfilled, and his righteousness revealed, by their expected Messiah. But as these were spiritual blessings, they would not be welcome to the carnal hearts of men: and therefore it behooved them to prepare for the reception of them, by repentance, attention to justice and equity, and attendance on his ordinances. For though such as trust in their supposed good works are far from the kingdom of heaven; yet all that believe the Scriptures, and wait for salvation according to the promises of God, repent, and do works meet for repentance; they do justice, and are conscientious in their various duties. And happy is he that doeth this, laying hold of it as a man in earnest, keeping holy the Sabbath day, and withholding his hand from doing any evil; for such are not far from the kingdom of God; and the Lord will show them his salvation, as he hath taught them thus to wait for it. V. 3—7. Strangers and eunuchs lay under several disadvantages, according to the Mosaic dispensation, (Deut. xxiii. 1—8:) and it was deemed a peculiar misfortune, and even disgrace, among the Jews, to be childless. But the Gospel abolishes all these distinctions; and such declarations as this implied that the shadows of the old dispensation were about to vanish, and that a brighter day was dawning. The Gentile could not in any case be admitted to the full privilege of an Israelite, without circumcision and an exact observance of the ritual law; and in some cases he would after all lie under several disqualifications. But, without mentioning these externals, the Lord assured strangers, that came to join themselves to him, to love his name and be his servants, to hallow his sabbath, and take hold of his covenant of grace and mercy; (Iv. 3.) that he would introduce them as spiritual worshippers upon his holy mountain, make them joyful in his courts, and accept their sacrifices equally with those of the Jews: for he intended his temple to be a house of prayer for all people. (Marg. Ref.) This was an encouragement to the Gentiles to come and worship God at his temple; and it implied that the spiritual sacrifices of praise and prayer, springing from faith and love, were the most acceptable to him: but it especially and most expressly predicted the conversion of the Gentiles to Christ, and their admission into the Christian Church, which were typified by Mount Zion and the Temple. 'The prophet uses such expressions with relation 'to the Gospel-times as are taken from the usages of his 'own time.' (Calvin.) 'This is a good rule of explaining 'the idioms of the prophetical writings.' (Lowth.) The Lord also assured the eunuchs, who laid hold of his covenant, and were obedient to his word, that he would admit them into his family, and give them an everlasting name and place in heaven, far preferable to the feeble satisfaction, which men enjoy from the hope of being remembered after death, in the children which they leave behind them. The repeated mention of keeping the sabbath, in this place, which evidently gives a decided preference to spiritual worship and holiness of life, above all external observances, and refers to the time when the ceremonial law would be abrogated; strongly implies the obligation of the Christian sabbath.

V. 8. JEHOVAH, who gathered the outcasts of Israel, here promises to gather more unto him, than had already been gathered. This predicts the conversion of the Gentiles to Christianity in far greater numbers, than they ever had been proselyted to Judaism: but it may also look forward to the future gathering of the outcast Jews into the Church, and the consequent bringing in of the fulness of the Gentiles.

V. 9—12. Under the terms watchmen and Shepherds, both the priests and scribes, and civil magistrates seem to have been intended; the teachers and rulers of Israel, especially the former: but this severe rebuke was probably expressed in general terms, that it might equally apply to such characters in other ages and places. There might be many such in the prophet's time whose likeness he delineated, and still more before the captivity who resembled them: but it was most generally and exactly verified in the character of the chief priests, scribes, and elders, in the days of Christ, and just before the destruction of the city and temple by the Romans. The nation in general was given up to wickedness; but the chief blame belonged to these their corrupt teachers and rulers. Through their supineness and profligacy, the nation was exposed to ruin; and the Roman armies were summoned to execute vengeance upon it, under the figure of the wild beasts of the forest being called on to come and devour a neglected flock of sheep. The watchmen were so blind and ignorant, that they saw no danger: even the shepherd's dog could bark when the wolf came; but they were dumb dogs and could not bark; they were neither capable of instructing the people, nor inclined to do any thing towards it; for they were lazy, drowsy, and utterly insensible. But though they did not copy the faithfulness and vigilance of the dog; yet they were more greedy than that animal, and their rapacity could not be satisfied. They understood not their duty as shepherds; but they were sufficiently quick-sighted and attentive to their interest, and every one was looking out to see what lucre he could acquire in his peculiar station, by any means whatever. They were likewise equally luxurious and intemperate; and expected a perpetuity and an increase of prosperity and self-indulgence, when they were upon the brink of ruin! Alas, how many, in every age of the Church hitherto, might here, as in a mirror, have recognized their own likeness, if they had not been blind!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—9.

Though we cannot be justified by our own works; yet we cannot be saved in our sins: they, therefore, who, "through the Spirit, wait for the hope of righteousness "by faith," will be found walking in the ways of holy obedience. There can be no piety without honesty, nor acceptable honesty without piety. He then is the happy man, who layeth hold of the precepts, as well as the promises, of God's word; who halloweth the day, and attendeth on the ordinances of the Lord; who abhorreth that which is evil, and cleaveth to that which is good; and who thus "waits for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal "life." Thanks be to God, we are none of us at present separated from him or his people, by any thing except wilful sin and unbelief: and if we come "to join ourselves "unto him, to choose the things that please him, and to "take hold of his covenant; to love his name, and be his "servants;" we shall be sure of acceptance, through the one oblation of our great High Priest. We are now come to mount Zion, and to the city of the living God; (Heb. xii. 22—25:) and may expect to be made joyful in his house of prayer, and our spiritual sacrifices will be acceptable to him through Jesus Christ. And should any of those, who are interested in such blessings, be childless, or afflicted with any bodily infirmity, they need not disquiet themselves: the comforts of religion will counterbalance all external crosses; a name and place in the family of God are far preferable to a numerous offspring; and his everlasting mercies far better riches than the treasures of this world. Let us then seek all our felicity from the God of salvation, and walk with him in all his ordinances and commandments blameless; and let us rejoice in the assurance, that he, who hath gathered us poor out-casts into his family, will gather others, besides those, and more numerous than those, that have already been gathered to him.

V. 10—12.

Alas, the visible Church hath hitherto been grievously corrupted, through blind watchmen and ignorant teachers, who like dogs can bark at and bite the sheep, and greedily devour them; but seem at league with the wolf and lion, from which they ought to defend the fold! Who cannot through ignorance, or will not through laziness, preach the truths of God to the people to warn them from the wrath to come, and will not permit others, if they can help it! Who are ever in pursuit of preferment, and after having added one to another, are yet dissatisfied! Who are asleep and dreaming of worldly pleasures, when they should be preaching and praying; but are awake, and keep a sharp look out, when filthy lucre from any quarter can be obtained! Who never study, and do not understand, any part of their pastoral duty; but know very well how to fleece the flock, and to make the most of their income! Who are as lavish and luxurious in spending, as they are rapacious in getting; wasting those benefices in intemperance or magnificence, that were given to be used in charity and hospitality! And who are encouraging each other in sensuality, filling themselves with strong drink, and presumptuously expecting that "to-morrow shall be as this "day, and much more abundant;" when they, and those that blindly mistook such hirelings for shepherds, are about to fall into the ditch together. From such pastors, O Lord, deliver thy Church: open the eyes of those to whom any part of this character belongs, to see their guilt and danger, that they may escape them: teach those "who have the "rule" over thy people to set their faces against such abuses, and to exclude such blind guides, such dumb greedy dogs, such covetous and sensual watchmen, from the sacred function; and to oppose them by a contrary example, as well as by authority. And Oh! send us pastors after thine own heart to feed thy people with knowledge and understanding; that we may rejoice in thy holy name, and that believers may be daily added to thy Church; even so be it, Lord Jesus, thou good and chief Shepherd of the sheep.

NOTES.

CHAP. LVII. V. 1, 2. This chapter and the next, are written in so general a manner, that they may accord to several different periods of the Jewish history. But they are equally applicable to the state of the Christian Church, during the prevalence of papal idolatry and superstition: and if we suppose any connexion in this part of the book, we must conclude that they refer to those times; for we shall soon find the prophet speaking in the most evident manner of the glorious events, which will succeed the fall of antichrist. In the conclusion of the preceding chapter, the extreme wickedness of the rulers and teachers of the Church was pointed out, as one sign of approaching judgments: here the disregarded removal of the righteous is mentioned as another. They are said to "perish," not with reference to themselves, but to the irreparable loss sustained by their survivors: though none were duly affected by it, or considered that the Lord took the righteous away in love, that they might not be involved in those calamities, which their prayers, labours, and example could no longer retard. But "he" (that is, each godly person,) enters into peace; his soul being removed to heaven, his body sleeps as in a bed till the resurrection: and this is the case with every one, that hath walked before God in integrity and uprightness. (Marg. Ref.) The death of Josiah, who was taken away before vengeance was poured out on the Jews, may be predicted as an illustration of this general truth. 'The soul of the righteous 'shall be in joy; and their body shall rest in the grave, 'unto the time of the resurrection; because they walked 'before the Lord.'

V. 3—6. JEHOVAH here cites apostates and hypocrites to appear before him. They are not the genuine children of Abraham, or the sons of God and the Church; but rather the sons of a sorceress, the increase of adultery and whoredom: they were descended from parents that had been guilty of such crimes, and they resembled them in their conduct. They were more properly the synagogue of Satan, than the Church of God, and Babylon's children rather than Jerusalem's. 'Men are in Scripture called 'the children of those whose practices they imitate.' (Lowth.) By whoredom and adultery we may understand idolatry; and idolaters are represented as the offspring of the adulteress church and her paramours. They are charged with having derided the servants and children of God, expressing their scorn by every contemptuous gesture; and diverting themselves by mocking them, not considering that they despised God in his people. This they did to be revenged of the prophets, who reproved them for their sins; but could they deny, that they were children of disobedience and hypocrisy? Being eagerly bent upon idolatry, they performed their worship under every green tree: and whilst they adored proud, ambitious, revengeful, cruel, intemperate deities, the imagined characters, pretended exploits, and abominable rites of these idols, inflamed them with every diabolical and sensual lust: so that they even sacrificed their children, in lonely valleys, and in the caverns of the rocks. They were accustomed to take stones from the brooks; to set them up, and anoint them with oil: and whenever any of them met with a stone of this kind, they paid a stupid worship to it, with drink-offerings and meat-offerings, as if it had been their god and portion! And indeed they were likely to have all the happiness which such deities would allot them, and no other; for could they suppose that the Lord would take pleasure in idolaters, or even endure them?

V. 7, 8. Here the idolatrous church is represented as a woman, that hath violated her marriage covenant, and as grown impudent in her adulteries. The idol-temples, (which were as the adulterous bed,) were built upon the highest mountains, to which the worshippers openly ascended to offer sacrifice. Yet they had in their own houses, behind the doors and on the posts, miniature pictures or images of their deities, to put them in remembrance of that public solemnity. Thus they shamelessly violated their covenant with God, by worshipping idols; they multiplied the objects of their abominable worship, and solemnly covenanted with them as if enamoured of them at first sight.

V. 9, 10. The kings and people of Judah often paid court, and made presents, to the idolatrous kings of Egypt or Assyria; and entering into confederacy with them, they conformed to their customs, and worshipped their gods: and thus debased themselves to the lowest degree of infamy. They sent their ambassadors also to a great distance, and wearied themselves in long journeys. And they would not despair of help in this way, though often rebuked and punished for it: for they allayed their present fears, and shifted off present dangers by such expedients; and therefore they were not grieved, or did not wholly faint, on account of the trouble and hardship attending them. Many of the preceding expressions accord to the idolatry of the Jews; but here the self-imposed austerities, the laborious and multiplied superstitions, and the expensive observances of popery, seem to be described. The anti-christian worship of images, and of saints and angels, the pilgrimages, penances, and indulgences of papists; their dispensations, and oblations or legacies to the priests, that by masses and prayers, they might deliver souls out of purgatory, better answer to this passage, than any idolatries practised by the Jews: and the king before-mentioned seems to point out the head of the Anti-christian Church, to whom, during many ages, men flocked with presents and tributes from every part of the western world; debasing themselves even to hell by their abject submissions. And though wearied with the burdens imposed on them, yet they persevered in their way, deeming obedience to the Romish hierarchy the life of their souls, expecting to merit heaven by these works of their own hands; and not grieving at any labour or expense, to soothe their consciences and buoy up their confidence.

V. 11, 12. The Lord here inquires of this corrupt company, of whom they had been afraid, that they pretended falsely to pay any regard to him, or that they had broken their covenant with him; had they feared him, they would have avoided other abominations; so that their hypocrisy was a needless sin. For they did not really remember him and his law, or lay them to heart; and his patience and silence for a long time, as if he had not regarded them, emboldened them to cast off his fear, and to expect impunity in their crimes. But he would show openly the nature of their righteousness and works, and prove them to be worthless and unprofitable. This seems peculiarly applicable to that Church, which holds the merit of good works in the most exorbitant sense; and yet sets the highest value upon unmeaning forms and worthless superstitions: and the Lord left that Church for ages to go on, as if he had taken no notice of her, which was never the case with the nation of Israel.

V. 13. These idolaters are here supposed to be in extreme terror, and crying to the Lord for deliverance; but they are sent to their companies of idols and idolatrous connexions for help. Yet they and their confidences would be alike carried away by the wrath of the Almighty, as by a wind, into utter ruin. This also is applicable to the destruction of anti-christians, notwithstanding their companies of mediators, and of tutelary saints and angels: whilst they, who trust in the Lord, according to his word, will be owned as his true people: and He will dwell among them, as in Canaan, and on mount Sion, with his ancient Church.

V. 14. Or, "One shall say," or, "I will say;" for it may be rendered either way. The Lord will say, or send one to say, "Cast ye up, &c."—Some interpret this of Cyrus's proclamation; but it is not likely that Cyrus should call the Jews his people. It is rather the word of God to his ministers and servants, to prepare the way for those who trust in him, and for sinners to return to him. They are commanded to level, and make straight the road, casting it up as a causey, and removing every thing that might cause the weak or inadvertent to stumble. (Marg. Ref.) There may be some allusion to the return of the Jews from Babylon; but it evidently relates to the return of sinners unto God, and the walk of believers through this world to heaven. The preparation for this is made, by clearly stating the truths, and proclaiming the invitations and promises of the Gospel; by showing the love of Christ, and the way of acceptance and of holiness; by obviating difficulties, answering objections, guarding against dangerous errors and extremes, and detecting the snares and wiles of Satan and of wicked men. But it may also relate to the interpositions of Providence, in removing those stumbling-blocks which are thrown in the way by the abuses, errors, wickedness, and contentions, which prevail within the Church. The occasions of idolatry were carefully removed after the captivity: the apostles and faithful ministers in every age, have obeyed this command: but the ruin of antichrist's kingdom, and the removal of those enormous scandals and abuses, which have so long obstructed the spread of the gospel, seem especially predicted.

V. 15, 16. The Jews, even when addicted to idolatry, gloried in their magnificent temple and worship; the Christian Church has been greatly corrupted by an attachment to splendid externals; and few of the human race have judged properly of that simplicity and spirituality, which are the excellency of divine worship; or of the value of a broken heart above all notions, forms, gifts, visions, or revelations. These lessons are here inculcated. The Lord declares his essential glory and majesty in the strongest terms; "the High and Lofty One, who inhabiteth eter "nity, whose name is Holy." As eternity is the habitation of his immutable existence, and holiness is his nature; so the high and holy place of heaven is his special residence, in respect of his sovereign and universal government. But he hath also a habitation on earth, in which he peculiarly delights, (even more than in the temple on mount Zion, except as it typified the human nature of Christ;) and that is, the heart that is broken down under the sense of guilt and unworthiness, and deeply humbled before God; which is crushed as it were in self-abasement, and broken off from all self-confidence and self-sufficiency. With such persons the Lord will dwell, in order to revive their drooping spirits, and comfort their dejected hearts, and give them life eternal. For though he alarms, convinces, and distresses them by showing them his majesty, justice, and holiness, and for a time contends with them by frowns and rebukes; yet the end being answered, he will cease to contend, and to be wroth with them; lest they should be driven to despair and incapacitated from serving him; as no creature can endure his perpetual frown and indignation. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 17, 18. (lvi. 11.) The people are here stated to have imitated the covetousness of their rulers and teachers; and it was connected with iniquity, fraud, oppression, or extortion: therefore the Lord smote Israel, or Judah, and hid his face from him. Under these rebukes he went on frowardly, in the way of his own perverse heart. But though the Lord saw his wicked ways and hated them: yet of his own mere grace he intended to convert and heal him, to take him under his tuition and guidance, and to comfort him, and those who lamented his calamities. This may be understood of the conduct of Judah previous to and during the Babylonish captivity; and of the freeness of God's mercy in his restoration. But the Jewish nation was more peculiarly addicted to covetousness in the time of Christ, and previous to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; their strictest professors of religion "devour-"ing widows' houses, and for a pretence making long "prayers." For this and other sins the Lord was wroth, and smote them, and they have ever since gone on frowardly in the way of their own hearts, and covetousness has all along been the characteristic of the nation even to a proverb. Yet the Lord will surely convert and save Judah, and become again his Guide and Comforter, for his own name's sake. This seems the more immediate meaning of the prophecy; and yet the avarice of the Church of Rome, her enormous exactions, and her infamous traffic for indulgences, dispensations, &c. must occur to the attentive reader's mind; and also the promises of God to recover his Church from this corrupt state, into which it has been so long sunk. By covetousness, in Scripture, we must generally understand the inordinate love of lucre, whether to hoard, or to lavish in luxury and indulgence.

V. 19. This seems to point out the method by which God revives, purifies, and comforts his Church. He raises up faithful ministers to preach his word; qualifies them for their work, gives them their message; and creates in their hearts that zeal for his glory, and compassion for souls, which produce earnest and instant preaching of the Gospel, the fruit of their lips; by which peace of every kind is proclaimed to Jews and Gentiles, far and near, and they are converted and healed. Thus religion was revived among a remnant of the Jews, and the Gentiles were called into the Church; thus, that nation shall be again converted, the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Zion's wounds and breaches shall be healed. It may also refer to the mercies through the Gospel bestowed on multitudes, and the gratitude excited in their hearts: and the Lord creates the fruit of the lips, by teaching them to offer the spiritual sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving.

V. 20, 21. Wicked men cannot have that inward peace which springs from the mercy and grace of God. Their turbulent passions, polluting lusts, and unquiet consciences, render them like the tempestuous restless ocean, when it casts up mire and dirt: so that, whatever external changes take place, "there is no peace, saith my God, to "the wicked." The promises before given therefore must not be so explained, as to encourage men to expect reconciliation to God and peace of conscience, without repentance and works meet for repentance: but that he would give the repentance and forgiveness of sins, by faith in Christ Jesus; while the impenitent and unconverted would be given up to destruction.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8.

The death of the righteous is the greatest gain to themselves, and loss to others, that can be imagined. They are exempted from the evils that are impending over guilty nations and churches; but their removal portends, and makes way for, divine judgments: yet this is seldom attended to, and scarcely ever duly laid to heart. In all events upright believers are safe and happy: and even

CHAP. LVIII.

The prophet is commanded boldly to reprove hypocrisy, 1, 2 He shows that pride, injustice, and oppression render fasts unprofitable, with the nature of an acceptable fast, 3—7. Promises to those who attended on these duties; and who duly hallowed the sabbath, 8—14.

their graves are quiet beds, in which they sleep in Jesus, and from which he will shortly awake them to everlasting joy and felicity. The enormous wickedness of those who are favoured with the word and ordinances of God, is a lamentable demonstration of human depravity. The spurious brood, which hypocrisy, superstition, and fanaticism have engendered within the visible Church, will easily be distinguished, notwithstanding names and splendid pretences, from her genuine children; and be punished with more severity than any other transgressors. We should neither be disconcerted, nor exasperated, if they treat us (as Ishmael did Isaac,) with mockery and derision in every form. Scoffs and calumny are their weapons, when more destructive instruments are placed out of their reach. Yet they little think against whom they sport themselves, when they ridicule the humble and faithful servants of the Lord: but he will shortly convict and expose them, silence their mockery and boasts, and show them to be children of transgression, a seed of falsehood. Men naturally love a religion that inflames and authorizes their unholy passions: and there is no absurdity so palpable, no cruelty, even to their children, or their own bodies, so horrid, of which they are not capable, if seduced into an opinion, that it will atone for their crimes, and purchase indulgence for the favourite lust; if it can be made subservient to their pride and ambition; or if it will quiet their consciences, and aid them to hope for happiness without Christ, or without holiness. This developes that mystery of iniquity, even idolatry, Pagan, Jewish, or Antichristian: the whole hath been suited to one or other of these purposes. And so entirely doth Satan blind the minds of numbers, that they expect the Lord should delight in, and reward them for such observances as he hath expressly forbidden and utterly abhors!

V. 9—14.

The zeal that men show in false religion, the boldness with which they avow their absurdities; their diligence and constancy, in public and private superstitions; the alacrity with which they weary themselves in burden some services, or severe penances; the pertinacity with which they hold fast their delusive hopes, and labour to establish their own righteousness, should remind us, who have a better cause, how earnest, constant, patient, and diligent we ought to be. The very devotees of superstition and idolatry avow, that religion is the grand concern; that it should be our main employment and satisfaction; that every thing should be sacrificed to it; and that no labour, loss, or hardship, should here be regarded. But we ought at the same time to remember, that except our earnestness be regulated according to the word of God, it will be unprofitable to us. It is vain to dissemble, or to pretend to fear God, and seek his glory, if we do not; they who really remember him, will be universally conscientious; and such as allow themselves in known sin, act from some sinister motive which the Lord will detect; and then he will show the corrupt nature of their righteousness and works, and manifest the reason of his rejecting them. His silence and patience encourage the presumptuous hopes of transgressors; but when he shall arise to judgment, the infidel and profane, the pharisaical and superstitious, the hypocritical, and enthusiastical; and all the advocates for vice, or for false religion, will discover their danger: but it will then be too late to cry for help; nor will any of their companions or idols avail them, but they will all be driven into destruction. But they who trust in, and love our God and Saviour, will inherit the kingdom prepared for them from the foundation of the world. It should therefore be our first care to learn the ways of God ourselves, and then, in our several places, to make them plain to others, and to remove every stumbling block, which obstructs the path. In this respect we have much to do, and much to pray for. The absurd and wild opinions, that are propagated; and the crimes that are committed, by men professing the doctrines of the Gospel; the multiplied controversies acrimoniously agitated amongst them; the horrible injustice and profligacy of men called Christians, in every quarter of the globe; the corrupt state of almost the whole visible Church, in doctrine, discipline, and practice; and the idolatry, imposture, and enormous covetousness of the Church of Rome, have long been stumbling blocks to infidels, Jews, Mahometans, and Pagans all over the world. The Lord calls upon Christians and ministers to remove these scandals as much as they can; and we should pray to him to raise up instruments that may do it effectually.

V. 15—21.

Whilst numbers stumble, and fall, and perish, through the offences which every where abound, it is by their own pride, unbelief, and enmity to God and holiness. "For "this high and lofty One, who inhabits eternity, whose "name is holy, who dwells in the high and holy place," delights in those that are poor in spirit and broken-hearted, mourners for sin, and supplicants for mercy, and grace: He will make his abode with those whose hearts he hath thus humbled, in order to revive and comfort them: he will not contend for ever with the penitent soul; he will not drive the contrite to despondency, nor leave him to perish under his frown. Let, then, no trembling supplicant give way to discouragement or hard thoughts of God; but let him continue to wait and pray, and ere long he shall be comforted. But though the Lord employs corrections to bring sinners to repentance, and to recover backsliders: yet they are not of themselves effectual. Even believers sometimes go on frowardly for a season, when smitten for their iniquity, and under the hidings of God's countenance: and many who seem to be religious in this way, become mere thorny ground, that brings forth no fruit to perfection.—Covetousness is idolatry, and it almost always produces iniquity likewise; yet few are much aware of its malignity. But if we have been delivered from this snare, or are recovered from such a state, we must acknowledge it to be the mere grace of God. He saw us, when we were walking frowardly in the way of our own hearts, and graciously determined to heal us by his sanctifying Spirit: thus he began to teach and guide us, and to bring us into the ways of holiness and consolation: thus he hath repeatedly recovered us, when we were departing from him, causing us to renew our godly sorrow, and restoring our comforts. The Gospel was sent to us when far off from God; the influences of the Holy Spirit, by which we were brought near, and that new heart from whence grateful praise, the fruit of our lips, originates, are alike his gift. Our salvation, with all its fruits, hopes, and comforts, is his work; it comes from him, and to him belongeth all the glory. But the destruction of the wicked is from themselves; their hearts cast up filthy imaginations and desires, and empty themselves in wicked words and works: their malignant passions and anxious forebodings, exclude them from peace: and as death for ever fixes a man's character; so they who die in sin will be left eternally proud, revengeful, envious, full of enmity against God and man, and given up to the torments of conscience and the rage of despair. Were there no other hell, the thoughts of such a condition are enough to harrow up the soul with consternation. Such men are, as it were, turned out of his hospital incurable; because they pertinaciously refused to be healed, or to use the means of healing. "There is no peace, saith my "God, for the wicked:" but "Let the wicked forsake his "way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let "him return to the LORD, and he will have mercy on "him, and to our God, and he will abundantly pardon."

NOTES.

CHAP. LVIII. V. 1. The prophet, while he protested vehemently against all wickedness, must especially "cry aloud" against the crimes of God's own people; not sparing to reprove them sharply, out of respect to friends, fear of enemies, or regard to interest. He must spend his strength, venture reproach and persecution; and "lift up "his voice like a trumpet," in giving an alarm to the people, and in exposing their hypocrisy. The Lord no doubt primarily addressed this command to the prophet himself; but it is equally obligatory on the ministers of religion in every age: and Isaiah might intend his warnings for the hypocrites of his own time; but the Holy Spirit had also those of other ages in view. The fasts observed by the Jews during the captivity merited the censure here given. (Marg. Ref.) The Pharisees in the time of Christ fasted often, in ostentation and hypocrisy, and to cloak their oppression and avarice; the great value put upon fasting by the Church of Rome, without regard to a correspondent temper and conduct in other respects, is notorious. But Vitringa thinks that this chapter, in its connexion with what precedes and follows, may relate to the reformed or Protestant Churches. They have indeed renounced the idolatry and gross abuses of popery; but are grievously deformed by a worldly spirit and conduct, and great formality in religious duties, where the form is not thrown aside: and this brings the matter home to ourselves.

V. 2. The house of Jacob, in the time of Hezekiah, seems to have sat for this picture. They were not openly idolatrous or irreligious; nay, they were earnest and constant in their devotions, seeking the Lord daily, and taking pleasure in learning his truths and precepts, as if they were a very righteous nation; (Note, Ez. xxxiii. 30—33:) but they were pleased with these things, merely because they gratified their pride and curiosity, entitled them to respect, and increased their presumptuous confidence. Nay, they asked of God the ways of righteousness, and took delight in approaching him in his courts: for this was then fashionable and creditable, and it served as an easy commutation for their secret injustice, and as a cheap quietus to their consciences. This hath often been the case both in the Jewish and Christian Church, among papists and protestants.

V. 3, 4. The persons here addressed had mortified themselves with apparent sorrow and contrition, on stated or occasional fasts: they deemed this very meritorious; and they inquired wherefore the Lord had not noticed their services, and delivered them from their troubles? But he answered, that while they denied themselves in one respect, they indulged themselves in others; especially their pride, avarice, and malignant passions: for at the very time when they seemed to abase themselves before God in fasting, they exacted the full measure of hard labour from their oppressed slaves, or their usurious debts from their starving debtors. Their fasting increased their self-preference, and excited them to fierce controversies, or bitter resentments: it was also the cloak of, and commutation for, their exactions and oppressions of the poor, whom they most unjustly smote and abused, for not complying in every thing with their inclinations. And surely they should not fast in this hypocritical ostentatious and unrighteous manner, or call a day thus spent a fast, or expect that God would hear their prayers or accept their services.

V. 5—7. Could it be supposed, that the fast which the Lord approved, was "for a man to afflict his soul for a "day" (Marg.) with external appearances of sorrow and shame, and with bodily mortification, without repentance or reformation? The fast that God approved would be attended with the mortification of pride, avarice, and worldly lusts; and with the unequivocal fruits of true repentance. They that observed such a fast, would loose the bonds of those whom they had iniquitously enslaved or imprisoned; they would moderate the labours of their servants: they would cease from usurious exactions, and remit the debts which either were contracted through fraud and oppression, or which the poor debtor was unable to discharge; they would break every yoke of oppression, and use their authority and influence to protect the poor, or rescue them from the injustice of others. They would also be liberal to the needy according to their wants: and not get out of the way, or frame excuses, to avoid relieving them; remembering that they were of the same nature, and had the same feelings, as themselves. By these things their external humiliation before God, in fasting and prayer, would be shown to be sincere and profitable; but in no other way.

V. 8—12. When the people thus repented and did works meet for repentance, they might expect that their inward peace, or outward prosperity, would break forth and increase like the morning-light; and that their personal sickness, disquieted consciences, or public calamities would speedily be healed; their good works would go before them, as evidences to attest the sincerity of their faith and love, and for a memorial before God; and his glorious power and presence would protect them from those dangers to which they were most exposed. (Marg. Ref.) He would be as ready to answer their prayers, as they had been to answer the cries of their oppressed and afflicted brethren; whom they now no longer treated with scorn or menaces, or put off with vain pretences or deceitful promises. And when from their inmost souls, in genuine compassion and love, they were habitually ready to relieve the hungry and distressed, their trouble and inward grief should be exchanged for comforts and joy, resembling the noon-day light: the Lord himself would guide them, and supply their wants in every emergency; cause their bones to be full of marrow through health and plenty; make their souls pleasant and fruitful like a watered garden, and render their consolations abiding like the unfailing springs of water. Then should they become the honoured instruments of repairing the waste places of Zion, and building upon those foundations that were laid in former ages, but not further completed; and be named the repairers of Zion's breaches, and the restorers of her ways, that men might come from all around to worship and dwell there. This might apply to Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and others, who rebuilt Jerusalem, the temple, and the walls of the city after the captivity: and to all those, in every age, who have been or shall be instrumental in promoting true religion: and doubtless, from the Church, which shall first and best answer this description, will those instruments be raised up, who will be principally honoured in bringing forward that extensive and glorious spread of the Gospel, which we are taught to expect. 'This is chiefly meant of 'the spiritual Jerusalem, whose builders were the apos-'tles.'

V. 13, 14. As these prophecies chiefly relate to Gospel-times, a cogent argument may be deduced from them for hallowing the Lord's day by Christians. The rule here given implies, that men must not profane that day by doing their ordinary work, or seeking their secular interest; or by spending it in worldly pleasures and recreations; or by vain and trifling conversations, but that they should delight in the sabbath, as a holy day to be spent in the public and private duties of religion; honour it above all other days, and honour God on and for it. Thus they will find much joy and comfort in Him, be triumphant over and exalted above their enemies; be plenteously provided for, as the Israelites were in Canaan: and inherit the peculiar blessing which was the birth-right and heritage of Jacob.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—7.

The ministers of God want, not only great tenderness and skill to comfort the broken-hearted and tempted believers, but likewise intrepidity and firmness, that they may "reprove and rebuke, with all authority," those who act inconsistently with their profession: they should be disinterested, zealous for the glory of God, prepared for the cross, superior to personal considerations, to the fear of men, and the shackles of party and bigotry; that with all plainness they may detect the transgressions, and expose the hypocrisy, of those that "profess to know God, but in "works deny him." This requires more courage in the minister, and will generally expose him to greater trials, than all possible severity against avowed infidels and profligates. Self-love, selfish friends, and injudicious or timid Christians, will say to a man in such a case, "Spare thy-"self;" ambition, avarice, love of ease, and aversion to the cross will suggest to him, spare the rich and powerful: but God says, "spare not," and "we must obey him, and "not men," please him and not ourselves. And when the ministers of the reformed churches shall thus loudly protest against all the iniquity that prevails in them, (as well as against erroneous doctrines and Anti-christian abuses;) we may hope to see them further reformed and purified, and a further progress of the reformation. We all need continually to beg of God to assist us in examining ourselves; seeing men may go so far in the appearance of religion, with an unsound heart. As Herod heard John gladly, yet loved his brother's wife more than either God or his own soul; and as they "who have no root in "themselves, may receive the word with joy;" we should remember, that great delight in outward forms and religious speculations, may spring from pharisaical pride or diabolical delusion: and it must do so, when it consists with the love and allowed practice of one known sin. For, without repentance and works meet for repentance, knowledge puffeth up, faith is dead, hope presumptuous, joy carnal, and profession vile hypocrisy. Such as are strangers to the power of godliness, either neglect, or grow proud of the form: in their estimation good works rise in their value in proportion to their scarcity: and when it is owing to God's infinite patience that they are out of hell, they deem him unjust, if he slightly afflict them, and if he do not reward them with eternal happiness! But the Lord will manifest the corrupt motives of their tasks of reluctant devotion: and their conduct to their poor brethren, whom they enslave, oppress, starve, persecute, and exact upon unmercifully, will demonstrate the hypocrisy of their solemn fasts and ostentatious appearances of piety. Many who are very demure, and seem very humble in the house of God and at his table, are most contentious and tyrannical in their own families; and come from their devotions to distress and harass their wives, children, domestics, and dependents, with bitter words, perverse and cruel actions, and enormous injustice: nor are they more ostentatious in religion to get the good opinion of ministers and Christians, than vociferous in their rage and debates. But it is an invariable rule, that "he shall have judgment without "mercy, who hath showed no mercy:" God will not forgive our trespasses, if we do not heartily forgive our brethren; and he will mete to us in the measure that we have meted to them. No expressions of humiliation then can prove him penitent, who doth not loose the bands of wickedness, renounce his gainful iniquities, and aim to mortify his strongest lusts. No man's faith justifieth him, which doth not work by love; he that loveth God will love his brother also; and he that loveth his brother, will do him no injury, but will be ready to do him all the good he can. The Church has been too long amused with fasts and external austerities in some instances, whilst men found pleasure in other things far more suited to their carnal minds; fasts employed as the cloak of avarice and oppression, and the very watch-word of persecution. Yet, let us not confound the abuse with the use of this Scriptural method of expressing our godly sorrow and humiliation; but rejecting the fast which the Lord hath not chosen, let us attend to that which he approves and accepts.

V. 8—14.

When the external expressions and means of repentance, faith, and grace, are accompanied with the mortification of sin, reformation of life, and abundant exercises of love to the poor and needy, despising, neglecting, and excluding none from our affection or assistance, according to our ability, we may expect consolation in the ways of God. conduct proves our sincerity and honours the Lord, and he will honour and protect us on every side: our prayers will then be answered, our tribulations removed, or an adequate support afforded; by the light of God's countenance we shall pass through every darkness; he will provide for our wants, make our souls like a watered garden, and honour us with usefulness in his Church; for "the righteous "shall be had in everlasting remembrance." Many professed Christians prove themselves hypocrites by a contrary conduct: and many real Christians walk uncomfortably all their days, because their liberality is disproportionate to their affluence; their evidence is therefore low; they little honour God and he little honours them; for he dispenses consolation to them, according to their niggardliness to his poor people. Experience evinces, that they who, in humble faith and love, "draw out their souls to the hungry," and abound most in devising liberal things, are most comfortable, and most honoured to be useful in the Church of God, (a sweet reward to their benevolent minds!) and often they have the most outward peace and prosperity. Let us then avoid, with equal caution, pharisaical pride and antinomian sloth or selfishness: and let those who walk uncomfortably, examine whether their conduct towards their poor brethren does not point out at once the reason and the remedy. True faith unites justice, mercy, and piety: in proportion as we are spiritually minded, we shall hallow, honour, and delight in, the sabbaths of God; and laying aside all employments, pleasures, or discourse, that can interrupt our sacred rest in him, we shall seek communion with him in his public and private ordinances. Thus we shall learn to delight in God, and to anticipate heaven; we shall obtain the victory over the world, sin, and Satan; we shall follow those who through faith and patience have inherited the promises; and we shall at last be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting;' for "the mouth of the LORD hath spoken it."

NOTES.

CHAP. LIX. V. 1, 2. This chapter continues the subject of the preceding; and begins with a further reply to those who complained that God did not regard their fasting and prayers. What has therefore been observed of the times to which that refers, applies to this also: and as the latter part of this chapter, and that which follows, must be understood of the millennium; so (whatever reference there may be to previous situations of the Jewish or Christian Church,) there is some reason to think, with Vitringa, that the low state of the reformed or Protestant Churches, antecedent to that event, is here predicted. If we reflect on the state of these churches, in respect of evangelical truth and vital religion, we must be convinced, that they have lamentably declined since the reformation: and though popery may have lost ground; yet infidelity, skepticism, socinianism, impiety, and vice of every kind, have exceedingly increased. The true people of God are indeed chiefly to be found in those churches; yet they are verging further and further from the purity and strictness of the Gospel, in every respect, except as toleration hath for a time supplanted the monster persecution: and even this great advantage is attended with an indifference about divine truth; or rather an indifference what errors are maintained, provided men be not zealous for the doctrines of the reformation. We have also reason, from several prophecies, to expect still greater departures from the faith; and grievous calamities to be brought on the nations adhering to the Gospel, from those who openly oppose it, whether papists or infidels. It may therefore be supposed that the Holy Spirit predicts these things in the former part of this chapter, as introductory to the most glorious state of the Church on earth: and no events can be mentioned, that are so answerable to what is here foretold, and so connected with what next follows, as to be put in competition with what hath been mentioned. But whatever be the prophetical meaning of the passage, it contains a sermon generally useful to the Church, in all her calamities and distresses. The prophet reminds the people not to ascribe the duration of their afflictions, or the delay of an answer to their prayers, to the Lord's want of power or inclination to deliver them, or to his inattention to their requests; but wholly to their unrepented iniquities, which separated betwixt them and the God whom they professed to worship, and provoked him to hide his face and reject their petitions.

6 Their [l] webs shall not become garments, [m] neither shall they cover themselves with their works: [n] their works are works of iniquity, and the act of violence is in their hands.

7 Their [o] feet run to evil, [p] and they make haste to shed innocent blood: [q] their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity; [r] wasting and * destruction are in their paths.

8 The [s] way of peace they know not; and there is [t] no † judgment in their goings: they have made them [u] crooked paths: [x] whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace.

9 ¶ Therefore [y] is judgment far from us, neither doth justice overtake us: [z] we wait for light, but behold obscurity; for brightness, but we walk in darkness.

10 We [a] grope for the wall like the blind, and we grope as if we had no eyes: we stumble at noon-day as in the night; we are [b] in desolate places as dead men:

11 We [c] roar all like bears, and [d] mourn sore like doves: we look for judgment, but there is none; [e] for salvation, but it is far off from us.

12 For [f] our transgressions are multiplied before thee, and [g] our sins testify against us: for our transgressions are with us; and as for our iniquities, [h] we know them;

V. 3—8. The professed people of God were guilty of murders, rapines, perjuries, lies, and impiety: none of them demanded justice on delinquents, or pleaded for the truth; either the truth of God's word, or the truth of the causes that came before them. They trusted in vanity and deceit, and used lying pretences in defending their conduct: they conceived mischief to their neighbours in their hearts, and thence brought forth iniquity in their lives: with great ingenuity and assiduity they accomplished those projects, which proved pernicious, or useless, "hatching cock-"atrices' eggs, and weaving the spider's web;" so that he who shared in the fruits of their labour, was seduced into destructive errors and iniquities, or involved in ruin: and when advantage was expected from their ingenious schemes and persevering efforts, and the egg, so to speak, was hatched, a viper burst forth for their destruction. Nor could their ingenuity in devising schemes, (as the spider frames its web from its own bowels,) to deliver or save themselves, become garments to cover them, or their own works justify them; for indeed they would appear to be works of injustice and violence. They lost no time, and spared no pains to do evil, and to shed innocent blood: all their thoughts were employed about iniquity, and wherever they went, devastation and destruction attended their paths. They had no acquaintance with the ways of peace, judgment, and justice; and they walked in such crooked and winding paths of subtile policy and selfishness, that none, who go in them, can know any thing of peace with God, or true peace of heart and conscience. (Marg. Ref.)—Alas! how exactly does this correspond with the conduct and character of professed protestant Christians, in every quarter of the globe.

V. 9—15. The pious remnant here lament the public calamities, the decay of religion, and the darkness which rests upon their path. Because of the enormous wickedness of the professed people of God, he stood at a distance, and did not execute judgment between them and their avowed enemies, and they were unjustly oppressed without redress. They waited for more prosperous times and brighter prospects; but the darkness continued to increase: they groped for the wall to lean against or to direct their path, or they wandered out of the way like blind men: they stumbled at noon, as if it were midnight; that is, they were at a loss and made fatal mistakes in the most obvious matters: and they were neglected, as the dead are cast out into unfrequented places. Their loud complaints were like the roaring of bears, their continual lamentation like the mourning of doves: whilst they in vain waited for judgment and deliverance from their oppressors. But they confessed that by their multiplied sins, of which they were conscious, and which testified against them, they deserved all their sufferings. For rebellion, hypocrisy, apostacy from God; oppression, fraud, false witness, and every kind of injustice abounded among them: so that truth and equity were openly perverted, trampled on, or banished: all sincerity and integrity were done with, and if any one ventured to be so singular as to make a conscience of his duty, he became a prey to his less scrupulous neighbours, or was treated by them as a fool or a madman. And no wonder that the Lord was displeased at beholding such enormities amongst those who professed to be his worshippers.

V. 16—19. When it might have been expected that the Lord would inflict the severest vengeance on those, that had so provoked him: behold he appears, to introduce the most glorious triumphs of his grace! When none in comparison were left to protest against the wickedness that prevailed, or to intercede with God, to interpose and fulfil his promises; then his own arm would effect the salvation he intended: and his righteous regard to his promises, the cause of godliness, and the honour of his law, and his just indignation against his enemies, would sustain him. His purpose of executing justice on some, and of saving others, would be as his breast-plate and helmet; and vengeance as his military vest, and zeal for his own glory, would be conspicuous above all, as a cloak. Thus armed for the conflict, and prepared for judgment, he would deal with men according to their deeds; executing vengeance upon his obstinate enemies to the most remote regions of the earth, and receiving humble penitents to his mercy and favour. Then would men fear and worship his name from the most western regions, to the most eastern, (from America to China, or Japan:) and at the very time when Satan, the great enemy of God, would come in to bear down all before him, by an inundation of infidelity, impiety, and wickedness, the spirit of God would lift up his standard and call together his armies to oppose his progress and subvert his cause. There can be no doubt but the grand accomplishment of this prophecy is future: and as they among whom iniquity so abounded, antecedent to this happy change, are spoken of as the professed people of God, and never accused of idolatry; and as the Lord is represented as wondering that there was no intercessor amongst them: it is more natural to interpret it of corrupt and degenerate protestants, than either of the Jews who are avowed enemies to Christianity, or of papists who retain the worship of images, saints, and angels. (Notes, &c. lvii.)

V. 20, 21. The coming of the divine Redeemer in human nature for our salvation, seems to be here immediately predicted; as well as the effect of his gospel in the primitive times, and ever since: yet with reference to his coming, by the power of his Spirit, to purify, deliver, and enlarge his Church. (Notes, xi. 1—9.) JEHOVAH here covenants with Christ our Surety, and with those true Israelites who turn from their transgressions by faith in his name, to continue the Spirit that rests on Christ, and the words or doctrine which he hath delivered to his Church, amongst his spiritual seed, in the mouths of his ministers who preach it, and of his people who profess it, from age to age, to the end of the world: so that the gates of hell shall never prevail against his truth and grace; but there shall always be a remnant to believe, profess, and obey the gospel, through successive generations: till that period arrives, before predicted, but more fully declared in the next chapter, when the cause of truth and righteousness shall gain a decided, universal, and permanent victory. 'These verses are expounded by St. Paul, of that general 'restoration of the Jewish nation, which he assures us 'shall come to pass in the latter times.' 'God's promises 'are only to the penitent.' (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—8.

When our troubles continue, notwithstanding our prayers, and expectations of deliverance, we should examine seriously into the cause. We may be sure that "the "LORD's hand is not shortened, or his ear heavy;" he is as able to save, and as ready to hear prayer, as in former times: but iniquity, unrepented, unmortified, unpardoned, will separate betwixt our souls and God, and cause him to hide his face, and to refuse any comfortable answer. (Notes, &c. Josh. vii.) so that nothing but true repentance and faith in Christ can remove the separation, and make way for returning peace. Alas, what crimes have in every age filled and defiled the earth! But it is most lamentable, that the professed worshippers of God, who have the purest creeds and the most Scriptural administration of ordinances among them; and who protest against heresy, superstition, and idolatry with decided vehemence and pertinacity, are often guilty of multiplied murders, rapines, oppressions, perjuries, lies, blasphemies, and impieties! Nay, such criminals often escape with impunity, and have able advocates retained to extenuate their guilt, and varnish over their crimes: whilst scarcely any dare call for justice, or plead for truth, through fear of reproach and formidable enemies! But, except the grace of God convert the heart, men will in one way or other "trust in vanity and lies," "conceive mischief, and bring forth iniquity." Not only do we find enormous wickedness amongst rapacious oppressors and powerful wasters of mankind: the schools of philosophers often produce more specious, but still more fatal instruments of destruction. With exquisite ingenuity and persevering application, studious men hatch impious and infidel systems: these gratify the curiosity, pride, and presumption of man, and are congenial to his carnal mind and soothing to his conscience. Compositions are often framed with the most specious arguments, ornamented with enchanting elegance, and varnished over with plausible pretensions to candour, liberality of sentiment, and free inquiry. On this delicious poison numbers feed and perish; in these nests are hatched cockatrices and vipers, the brood of the old Serpent, and from thence they break forth with envenomed teeth to destroy the souls of men. Others are not employed in so pestiferous a manner: but they ingeniously weave a spider's web, and compared with their own schemes of self-effected salvation, they despise the Redeemer's robe of righteousness, "which is "upon, and unto all that believe." Yet their webs shall not become garments; neither shall any of their devices cover the shame of their nakedness, or preserve them from detection and the wrath of God. And it is observable, that protestants, who have renounced the reformers' doctrine of justification by faith through the righteousness of Christ alone, to trust in their own good works, are in general remarkably defective in the very appearance of them. Many of them deem it very meritorious not to perpetrate such crimes as would expose them to the lash of human laws; and many of them "do works of iniquity, and "the act of violence is in their hands." Indeed the feet of every man, who is destitute of the Spirit of Christ, run swiftly to evil of one kind or other: and the history of mankind, and daily observation show, that where the restraints of fear, shame, and human laws are removed, and men can do it with impunity, their mad passions render them in haste to shed innocent blood. But whilst they waste and destroy others, regardless alike of justice, truth, and humanity; they are themselves strangers to peace and comfort: others watch their opportunity of retaliation; and their crooked paths lead them far aside from the way of peace and salvation.

V. 9—21.

When the general character of any church or community, where Christianity is professed, becomes corrupt and abandoned, it is reasonable to expect, that it will be left in the hands of its enemies: and vain will be the hope of deliverance or prosperity, without repentance. For their heinous crimes men are given up to be deluded and infatuated; to grope, and stumble in the clearest and most obvious concerns; and to proceed from one delusion and calamity to another, till they sink into the dark pit of destruction. Men may groan and murmur, they may mourn and lament under their calamities, and make trial of a thousand methods of deliverance: but nothing will effectually profit them, whilst they reject Christ and his Gospel, and go on in impenitence and wickedness: and the few who are not utterly blinded, will readily perceive the justice of God in all their miseries, whilst they witness such multiplied and continued iniquities. Should the Lord thus visit this protestant land, would not our transgressions testify against us? Could it be denied, that we have grievously offended "in transgressing, and lying "against the LORD, in departing from our God;" in oppression and rebellion, and base prevarication or falsehood, in the most sacred ordinances, solemn professions, and subscriptions? Alas, "judgment is," in many respects, "turned backward, and justice standeth afar off; "for truth is fallen in the street, and equity cannot enter. "Yea, truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil often "maketh himself a prey," or is deemed a prodigy and a derision: "this, the Lord seeth, and is displeased:" But we have yet a considerable number of exceptions to the too general rule: many still venture to protest against the wickedness of the times, and present continual supplications, through our heavenly advocate, for the revival of religion, and the purity and enlargement of the Church. What it may please God to do with us as a nation we know not: but if none be left to intercede, his own arm will accomplish his predicted salvation, and his righteousness will sustain him, in preserving and enlarging his Church. Armed with the breast-plate of righteousness, and the helmet of salvation, and arrayed with the garments of vengeance and zeal, he will ere long go forth, crush his enemies, and spread his Gospel from shore to shore, throughout the earth. (Marg. Ref.) So that, in every sense, when the enemy of our souls comes in like a flood, we may expect that the Spirit of God will lift up a standard against him. Let us then plead this promise in respect of the progress of infidelity, heresy, and impiety, which seem about to deluge our land: we should deeply lament these evils, but we need not despond; the covenant stands sure with our Redeemer and his whole family; and every one, whom he hath turned from transgression, may take comfort from it. His Spirit shall be communicated and his truth continued in his Church to the end of the world, in defiance of all the subtlety of earth and hell: and his cause shall as certainly gain a complete victory on earth: as the believer becomes more than conqueror, when the Lord receives him to his glory in heaven.

NOTES.

CHAP. LX. V. 1—3. (Notes, xxx. 25, 26. xlix. 18—23. Ps. lxxii.) We meet with nothing in the history of the Jews after the captivity, that at all accomplished the prophecy in this chapter. That nation never enjoyed such permanent peace and prosperity as in the days of David and Solomon; but here events are predicted inexpressibly more glorious. Even the happy change, that took place upon the coming of Christ and after his ascension, answered not to this description: the Church was indeed greatly enlarged and purified; but it was in great tribulation, and passed through successive persecutions, till the conversion of Constantine. Then it had a short season of external prosperity: but its purity had previously been greatly tarnished, and soon became much more so: it was speedily filled with time-serving hypocrites, split into furious parties, deformed with grievous heresies, and disgraced with abominable wickedness: and not long after the Roman empire was overwhelmed, and the Church was afflicted with dire calamities, which continued with little intermission, till Antichristian idolatry and superstition had gained a complete ascendency in the western, and Mahometanism had greatly entrenched on the eastern, division of the Church. So that nothing hath yet occurred which corresponds with these predictions; and they are therefore reasonably concluded to relate principally to future events. 'The subject of this chapter is the great increase and flou 'rishing state of the Church of God, by the conversion and 'accession of the heathen nations to it, which is set forth 'in such ample and exalted terms, as plainly show, that 'the full completion of this prophecy is reserved for future 'times. This subject is displayed in the most splendid 'colours, under a great variety of images highly poetical, 'designed to give a general idea of the glories of that per'fect state of the Church of God, which we are taught to 'expect in the latter times; when the fulness of the Gen'tiles shall come in, and the Jews shall be converted and 'gathered from their dispersions; and "the kingdoms of "this world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and "of his Christ." (Bp. Lowth.) The Church is here addressed as a disconsolate female, sitting on the ground in a dark place and obscure situation: this female is spoken of as the emblem of Zion or Jerusalem, and the imagery is taken from the walls and gates of that city; and from the temple and its ornaments, treasures, sacrifices, and worship, which were all shadows of good things to come. The Lord calls upon her to arise from the dust, that she might be enlightened, and shine by that light, which was now arrived; "for the glory of the LORD was risen upon "her." When Christ came in human nature, the Light of the world, the Sun of righteousness, and the Glory of the Lord, arose on the Church: but his bright beams have for ages been strangely obstructed, and at some times almost eclipsed, by interposing clouds; and his Church hath almost constantly been harassed with tribulations and persecutions; so that she hath mourned as desolate, and her few witnesses have prophesied in sackcloth. Not only did gross darkness envelope both the Gentile world and the Jewish nation, when Christ came in the flesh: but darkness, equally intense, hath covered the visible Christian Church, as well as the Mahometan and Pagan nations; and we have some intimations of a still more gloomy scene, just before the Lord shall arise in his meridian brightness, most gloriously to irradiate mankind with his beams of truth and righteousness. In the primitive times the Gentiles came to this light: but we do not find that kings did, till it became considerably obscured: but ere long all kings shall fall down before, and do service to, the divine Saviour. As he is the Sun of righteousness and the Light of the Church and of the world, he must be JEHOVAH; for "JEHOVAH shall arise" upon the Church, "and His "glory shall be seen upon her."

V. 4—7. Zion is here called on to lift up her downcast eyes, to behold the blessed effects of her irradiation. On every side converts were seen flocking to her, as her sons and daughters, from the most remote regions, to be nursed at her side, under her care and tuition, and fed upon her spiritual provisions. At this sight she would overflow with joy; her heart would be dilated with gratitude combined with reverence of God, and humble fear of acting wrong in such unexpected prosperity. For the multitudes which dwelt in the distant countries, separated from her by the sea, would be converted; and all their treasures, and all the wealth and power of the gentile world, would be brought to her. This would be as surprising to the remnant of poor believers, as it would have been to the Jews, after their successive oppressions, to have had all the rulers and grandees of Persia, Greece, Rome, and Tyre crowding into Jerusalem, with their immense revenues, in order to enlarge and beautify that holy city, and to support the temple-worship. In order to bring such vast treasures, Jerusalem must have been filled and surrounded with beasts of burden, such as the Midianites carried their merchandise upon. Thus they and the Arabians are represented, as bringing gold for tribute to Zion's King, and incense to be used in his worship as their God; that they might show forth his praises with all their power. All the flocks of Kedar and Nebaioth, other districts of Arabia, would be brought for acceptable sacrifices on God's altar: and thus he would honour and beautify more than ever his temple, where his name had so long been glorified. All this is evidently a figurative prediction of the purity and enlargement of the Church; of the alacrity and zeal with which different nations will dedicate themselves and their substance to the service of God; and of the multitude of spiritual sacrifices which will in every place be presented to the Father with acceptance, through Christ our Temple, Altar, and great High Priest. 'Nothing is more usual, 'than for the prophets to describe the state of the Christian 'Church, by representations taken from the Jewish temple 'and service.' (Lowth.)

10 And [e] the sons of strangers shall build up thy walls, and [f] their kings shall minister unto thee: for [g] in my wrath I smote thee, but in my favour have I had mercy on thee.

11 Therefore [h] thy gates shall be open continually; they shall not be shut day nor night; that men may bring unto thee * the forces of the Gentiles, and that their kings may be brought.

V. 8, 9. The multitude of converts is here represented under another figure. The Church sees immense numbers from every quarter thronging to her with one consent, as large flights of birds darken the air like a cloud, and as doves hasten to the windows of the dove-house: and she inquires, Who they are? To this the Lord answers, that surely the isles of the Gentiles would wait for him, to give them admission into his family: and that it would become the first use of the ships of Tarshish, which traded to the most remote regions, to bring her children, and all their wealth with them, to Zion, that they might worship the name of Zion's God, who thus glorified her: or they would be among the first that did so. This prediction will be accomplished, when Christians shall unanimously agree to make commerce and navigation subservient to the preaching of the Gospel, in every country with which they trade. For the locality of the emblem, taken from the Jewish temple and worship, rendered it necessary that it should be predicted in this manner; rather than as the setting up of the worship of JEHOVAH in those distant lands.

V. 10—14. The imagery is here varied, but the meaning is nearly the same. The protection given to the Church is represented by the building of Zion's walls: this would be done by the sons of strangers; and kings would minister to the formerly despised Church, when God, who had afflicted her in fatherly displeasure, should favour her in his mercy. But as no enemies would be dreaded, her gates would not be shut; and converts would continually throng into her, and meet with free admission: so that the forces and kings of the nations would be brought into her; and those that refused this subjection would be utterly wasted and perish. But when was this ever verified, in its obvious meaning? And why should we attempt to enervate the language of inspiration; as if the Lord could not, or would not, fulfil all his predictions, because he hath not yet done it? 'This must relate to the latter days, when the 'Church shall become "a great mountain, and break in "pieces all the kingdoms of the earth." (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) As the choice timber of Lebanon beautified Solomon's temple, that footstool of JEHOVAH, (Marg. Ref.) so shall the peculiar advantages of every nation, and of every description of men, concur to beautify the Church of Christ, which he hath determined to make glorious. The descendants of those nations that have persecuted her, shall humbly submit and supplicate her favour: yea, the very persons who have despised her, shall prostrate themselves before her, acknowledging her relation to JEHOVAH, the Holy one of Israel.

16 Thou shall also [r] suck the milk of the Gentiles, and shalt suck the breast of kings: and [s] thou shalt know that I the LORD am thy Saviour and thy Redeemer, the mighty One of Jacob.

17 For [t] brass I will bring gold, and for Iron I will bring silver, and for wood brass, and for stones iron: I will also [u] make thy officers peace, and thine exactors righteousness.

18 [x] Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, wasting nor destruction within thy borders; [y] but thou shalt call thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise.

19 The [z] sun shall be no more thy light by day; neither for brightness shall the moon give light unto thee: but the LORD shall be unto thee an everlasting Light, and [a] thy God thy Glory.

20 Thy [b] sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the LORD shall be thine everlasting Light, and [c] the days of thy mourning shall be ended.

21 Thy [d] people also shall be all righteous: they shall [e] inherit the land for ever, [f] the branch of my planting, the work of my hands, [g] that I may be glorified.

V. 15—22. The language here grows still more energetic, and the images employed more grand and magnificent. Zion had been forsaken and hated, and almost universally shunned: but now nations and kings should delight to contribute with all their ability to her comfort and prosperity, as much as the tender mother doth to suckle her beloved infant: being convinced that her Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty One of Jacob. The increase of knowledge, holiness, comfort, and prosperity in the Church shall be so great, that it shall resemble a new building erected in the place of an old one, in which gold and silver were used, instead of brass and iron, &c.; or, like a city, whose magistrates had been grievous oppressors, but were now become equitable and peaceable, in the greatest degree, and sought nothing but the quiet and prosperity of the public; and whose tax-gatherers had been oppressive exactors, but were now become more just and equitable. This represents the internal peace and purity of the Church, and the excellency of her rulers and teachers; (Note, lvi. 9—12.) Along with this, external peace will be connected: so that no wars, invasions, nor persecutions will disturb her repose; but the very walls of Zion will be justly called Salvation, and her gates inscribed with praise to her God and Protector. The Lord himself will shine upon the Church with so glorious and enduring a light, as shall eclipse all that hath heretofore been enjoyed by her, from the word and Spirit of God. And this light shall no more be withdrawn or obscured to the end: for the days of Zion's mourning shall then be ended; and this heavenly light, and glory, and joy on earth, shall usher in the light, glory, and joy of the eternal world. The people shall then be all righteous; they shall inherit the earth as long as it endures, and heaven for ever. The Church shall take root and grow, and flourish as a branch that God hath planted; and prosper as the work of his hands, that he may be glorified. From very small numbers and feeble beginnings, the people of God shall multiply, and become exceedingly numerous and powerful: this, the Lord will hasten with all due speed, when the appointed season arrives. We can conceive nothing more glorious than this description, and nothing can answer to it, but some future glorious state of the Church on earth, or the state of the Church triumphant in heaven. But many expressions limit our interpretation to the state of the Church here below: though many bold metaphors, and sublime images, remind us how much that state will resemble heaven.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—14.

The whole earth, from the fall of Adam to the end of time, would have been covered with ignorance, error, wickedness, and misery, if the Son of God had not come a Light into the world. This "Sun of righteousness" communicated some heavenly light to mankind, even before He actually arose; but his bright beams have been diffused far more vigorously and widely since that joyful event. Yet, after all, men in general have hitherto been greatly enveloped in gross destructive darkness; and are so at this day, wherever the light of revelation and the faithful preaching of God's word, are not afforded: nay, multitudes have the outward light, but are yet in darkness, because their eyes are blinded by Satan through their unbelief and love of sin: while we therefore bless our God that this light is come unto us, we should beseech him to "shine into our hearts, to give us the light of the know-"ledge of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ." This mercy is vouchsafed in order that we may arise from the dust and debasement of our carnal pursuits, and "let our "light shine before men," in our holy profession and conversation; that we may reflect the bright beams with which the Lord hath risen upon us, that his glory may be seen upon us, and that "men may see our good works, "and glorify his name." We should therefore watch and be sober, and walk as children of the light: and thus they who have been strangers and enemies, will be allured to that light that hath made so excellent a change in our conduct and character. Our peaceful and joyful walk may be as conducive to this end as our conscientious integrity: when Christians live up to their privileges, and enjoy much comfort, love sweetly constrains them to zealous obedience and close conformity to their Lord; then they appear both holy and happy, and attract the attention of others to their most excellent religion. As this must yield high satisfaction to the benevolent heart, it forms an additional motive to our diligence, watchfulness, and fervency in prayer; and as the purity, increase, and prosperity of the Church is the grand subject of these prophecies; so they ought to be of our desires, endeavours, and supplications.—Ministers and experienced Christians should lift up their eyes and look around them for such as are setting out in the ways of God, that they may encourage, caution, and instruct them; and that the children of God may be nourished up in the words of sound doctrine, under their prudent and affectionate inspection.—Our religious joy should always be tempered with reverential, humble, and cautious fear: and increasing prosperity, or an enlarged sphere of usefulness, should be rejoiced in with trembling, lest we should be lifted up in pride, or betrayed into any dishonourable conduct. All, that are truly converted to God, will dedicate their wealth and influence to him, and show forth his praises in their use of them. Thus it behooves every one to evidence the sincerity of his faith and love: for we shall at last be adjudged to belong to that master, in whose service we have employed our time, abilities, or substance. The learned, the sagacious, the ingenious, the powerful, may each contribute, in different ways, to promote the glory of God, and the peace, purity, edification, and enlargement of his Church: and when this is done in simple dependence on Christ, and from love to his name, it will come up with acceptance before our God. Happy will it be for themselves, and for multitudes, when merchants shall consider the conveyance of the light of divine truth to the most distant lands and newly discovered countries, as a primary object of their attention. Then their ships may sail more richly freighted than if they were laded with the gold of Ophir; they may safely be committed to His care, to whose glory they are devoted; and he will surely honour those who thus honour him.—Alas! we are not called upon to inquire who they are that fly as a cloud and as the doves to their windows. Few, in comparison with the numbers of our land, will attend upon the faithful preaching of the Gospel: but much fewer make the name of the Lord their Refuge and their resting place. Yet let us be thankful that there is a remnant, and hope and pray for better times: and let us see to ourselves, that the ordinances of God be to our souls as the house and the nest to the timorous dove.—It is a great honour and favour to us sons of strangers, that we may be allowed, in any humble sphere, to build the walls of Zion: and it is a privilege for kings to minister to that cause, for which the King of kings shed his precious blood. He, in whose hands are the hearts of kings, can easily bring them all to minister to his Church: and he will do it in his due time; for though he hath in his anger smitten her, he hath manifold mercies and favours in reserve for her. Blessed be his name, the gates of Zion are ever open to receive returning sinners, who come with the desire of their hearts to be enrolled as her citizens: the prayer of humble faith to Zion's God and King, can never be unseasonable, night or day; and every true convert is an accession to the strength, beauty, and honour of our holy city, at which angels in heaven rejoice. Thus from every quarter some do, and more shortly will, come to beautify the sanctuary of God; and by them he will glorify the house of his glory. The children of persecutors, and even persecutors themselves, are welcomed to all the privileges of Zion's citizens; when humbled for their sins, and disposed to honour her and join themselves to her, as the city of the Holy One of Israel.

V. 15—22.

The believer is often for a long time, afflicted, hated, and apparently deserted; yet the Lord will at length make him eternally excellent and happy.—They who attend duly to the truths, precepts, and ordinances of Scriptural Christianity, have long been filled with the contempt of the scornful, and have been reviled or hated by the wise, the learned, and the powerful of the earth; so that the cross to be endured has made men shy of being connected with them: yet this very company shall be made an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations; and powerful kings and nations shall rejoice to promote their comfort and prosperity, and to serve their interest with their whole heart, soul, and strength; knowing that their Saviour and Redeemer is JEHOVAH, the mighty God of Jacob. If then, in those happy days, when, "for brass the LORD will "bring gold, and for iron, silver, &c." all the officers of the nations and of the Church shall be peace, and their exactors righteousness: how should Christian magistrates, rulers, and teachers, aim now to be patrons and examples of peace and righteousness! And how should all Christian kings endeavour to terminate the effusion of human blood, and to avoid all violence, wasting, and destruction! For in those days men will be Christians indeed, and every one will do that which is equally the duty of all in this and every age, and from the neglect of which our miseries arise. The people shall then all be filled with knowledge, truth, and grace; they shall all be righteous, as "the "branch of God's planting, the work of his hands, that "he may be glorified;" and this will render earth almost like heaven. But if the Church may, and shall in due season, be thus illuminated, sanctified, and enlarged, and prospered with such permanent joy and peace: if her "walls may here be called Salvation, and her gates "Praise;" if she may be said to have done with mourning, even in this land of sorrow and death: what will the glory and happiness of heaven be, where "the LORD himself "will indeed be our everlasting Light, and our God our "Glory!" Let this hope cheer us under our present difficulties, and animate us to all diligence, that we may have an abundant entrance into this everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXI. V. 1—3. The prophet, having declared in general both the troubles and deliverances of the Church to the end of time, here returns to discuss some particulars more fully, which relate to those great events. This chapter refers to the coming of Christ, and the calling of the Gentiles. The allusions may be taken from the release of the captive Jews, and their return to their cities and lands: but Christ himself hath determined the interpretation to more spiritual and evangelical subjects. (Note, Luke iv. 17—21.) He is here introduced as the Speaker: and these first verses relate to his personal ministry and the general tendency and effect of his Gospel. The Spirit of the Lord rested on him to anoint, consecrate, and qualify him, as a man, for the work to which he was appointed. (xi. 1—3.) By virtue of his voluntary obedience and sacrifice, as our Surety and High Priest, he was authorized to preach the glad tidings of forgiveness and free salvation to the meek, the afflicted, the poor in spirit, the penitent, who know their guilt, danger, and misery; for though the Gospel is proposed to all, yet it does not appear glad tidings to any but the convinced humbled sinner. He was also commissioned effectually to bind up and heal the broken hearted; to proclaim liberty to the slaves and captives of Satan and sin, and effectually to free them from the bondage of their lusts, evil habits, and strong temptations. Thus he would announce the year of jubilee, (Note, &c. Lev. xxv.) the acceptable year of the Lord, the time of his especial grace, when he would pardon sins, remit debts, restore forfeited inheritances, receive offenders, to full favour, and grant all requests and petitions. But this would be connected with the day of his vengeance on those who opposed or neglected this great salvation. This seems especially to predict the respite granted to the Jewish nation, from the coming of Christ to the vengeance executed on them by the Romans. Yet it did not at all interfere with his commission to comfort all who mourned for sin, or in a gracious manner under their afflictions: He came to appoint gladness to all Zion's mourners, to give those who lay self-abased before God, as in sackcloth and ashes, the joy of acceptance and the beauty of holiness; to exchange their mourning and dejection for the consolations of the Holy Spirit, and those garments of praise which were used on festive occasions. And that, (adopting another figure,) they might be planted, watered, and made to grow vigorously, as trees of righteousness, in the courts of the Lord, being the planting of his hand, and bearing fruit to his glory. The reader need only advert to the encouragement Christ gave to the humble and broken-hearted publicans and sinners, in his personal ministry; and to the severity that he showed to proud Sadducees and Pharisees, to see the force of these expressions, and the genuine nature and tendency of his Gospel. It is observable that our Lord, in applying this passage to his own ministry, omitted the words, "the day of vengeance of our "God;" no doubt, because he would not, at the first address, say any thing needlessly to offend his countrymen.—The Septuagint render the clause, "the opening of the "prison to them that are bound;" "the recovering of "sight to the blind;" and thus it is quoted by St. Luke. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 4—6. Zerubbabel, Joshua, Nehemiah, and others, rebuilt Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, after the captivity; and some think, that this passage predicts the return of the converted Jews to their own land, and settling again in it: but it seems rather, from the context, to be a figurative description of the happy effects produced by the preaching of the Gospel in the primitive times. Vital piety had been at a very low ebb for some ages, when our Lord entered on his ministry. Those blind guides, the Scribes and Pharisees, had made "void the commandments of God by "their traditions" and interpretations. The Sadducees also, by their infidel principles, had increased these desolations. But the apostles and primitive evangelists, having been humbled, comforted, and sanctified, by our Lord's ministry, were employed to build up what was decayed and gone to ruins. By the blessing of God on their labours, many tens of thousands among the Jews became humble disciples of Christ, and spiritual worshippers of God through him. And by the conversion of the Gentiles, the Church was replenished with numbers of believers, immensely greater than had ever been known, even before "the de-"solations of many generations." Thus Zion was built up, and her desolated cities rose from their ruins; according to the figurative language often used even in the New Testament. (Note, lviii. 12. Marg. Ref.) The strangers and aliens, thus brought into the Church, were not only useful to the apostles, evangelists, and Jewish converts,

7 For [t] your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: [u] everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For [x] I the LORD love judgment, [y] I hate robbery for burnt-offering; and [z] I will direct their work in truth, and [a] I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And [b] their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that [c] they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed.

10 I [d] will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in my God; [e] for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, [f] as a bridegroom * decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself [g] with her jewels.

11 For [h] as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; [i] so the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and [k] praise to spring forth before all the nations.

by their "temporal things" and outward services, to which the language next used seems restricted; but they were ordained as elders over the churches planted by the apostles and evangelists; and thus, in a spiritual sense, fed their flocks, and became their ploughmen and vine dressers; that is, they were stated pastors over the sheep of Christ, and labourers in his husbandry and vineyard. Yet some peculiar distinctions were reserved to the Jewish converts. All the apostles, and writers of the New Testament, were of that nation. The pastors and ministers from among the Gentiles, were in general ordained to that office, by the apostles and Jewish evangelists, and were for a long time under their immediate superintendency, or that of such as were sanctioned by them. Perhaps this distinction was figuratively alluded to, when it was said, "Ye "shall be named the priests of the LORD; men shall call "you the ministers of our God," &c. The priests of Aaron's line were set aside; and they succeeded to as much of their office and authority, as accorded to the nature of the Christian dispensation. But perhaps the verse, in general, means that all true Christians would be more honoured, and admitted nearer to God, than the priests and Levites among the Jews. (Marg. Ref.) Thus the riches of the Gentiles were brought into the Church, and the poor converts of the Jews possessed all in which these had gloried; whilst the Gentiles were admitted to share their spiritual things; and the Jews had some ground of triumph and exultation; when their despisers and enemies joined with them in the worship of JEHOVAH, and in receiving and submitting to the Messiah, that had been predicted by their prophets, and had arisen of their nation, and been made known to them by their teachers.

V. 7—9. This may take in the whole success of the Gospel in the world. Instead of that contempt, which the worshippers of JEHOVAH had experienced from their neighbours, they would receive a double portion of honour and respect from the Gentile converts to Christianity: Believers and preachers of the Jewish nation would be peculiarly regarded, even in those lands where they had formerly met with injury and ignominy; and this joyful change would endure to the end and for ever. As the Lord loveth judgment, and hates robbery and injustice, even when varnished over with a profession of godliness, and especially when the gains of them are pretended to be consecrated to his worship: so he had determined to reject the hypocritical Jewish nation, and to replenish his Church with believers from among the Gentiles. He would direct the works of his people and ministers in truth and uprightness, and make a new covenant with them which should endure to the end; and their believing posterity from age to age should be known and acknowledged among the nations, as a holy people, happy in the favour, and sanctified by the grace of God. 'God blessed Job after his 'afflictions, when he gave him double to what he had 'before.' 'The first born had the double share in his 'father's estate: so the Jews, when converted to Christi-'anity, shall recover their birth-right, and be esteemed the 'first-born, or elder brethren in the Church.' (Lowth.) The apostles and Jewish converts to Christianity had this birth-right or precedency in the primitive times: and indeed the Scriptures, almost all written by Israelites, and in every age received by Christians of all other nations as the oracles of God, give this double honour to them. Perhaps, however, the restoration of the converted Jews to their own land, where they shall permanently enjoy their double, is also predicted.

V. 10, 11. The Church here answers to those gracious assurances that had been given her, declaring that she greatly and inwardly rejoiced in the LORD her God, and anticipated the glorious times that had been predicted. For he had arrayed her with his salvation and righteousness, as her covering and ornament, in order to her espousals to himself; for which he thus made preparation, as the bridegroom was used to deck himself with ornaments, and the bride to adorn herself with the jewels presented to her. And she expressed the fullest assurance, that as the earth, or even the well cultivated garden, yields an increase of the seed sown in it; so surely would the LORD cause righteousness for his people, and praise and glory for himself, to spring forth before all the nations of the earth. The word rendered ornaments, is supposed to mean a crown like those worn by the priests; indeed the whole alludes to the "garments for glory and beauty," worn by the high priest, and the white linen worn by all the priests; the word rendered decketh himself, properly signifies a priest's habiting himself with the ornaments proper for his office:

CHAP. LXII.

The prophet, as a type of Christ, shows his zeal in interceding for the performance of God's glorious promises to his Church, 1—5. Vigilant watchmen are promised; who, with other believers, are excited to the same zeal, 6, 7. God confirms his promises by an oath, 8, 9. and this language is peculiarly applicable to the case of Christians; who, adorned with the robe of righteousness conferred on the great High Priest, are through him made kings and priests to our God. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The office of the great Redeemer, and the tenour of his Gospel, are peculiarly encouraging to the humble and teachable, to those who are burdened with a guilty conscience, and fears of deserved wrath; and who are distressed through the power of inbred sins and strong temptations. Let such discouraged souls then attend to the voice of Christ: he was anointed, and sent to bind up the broken hearted, to pardon the self-condemned, to break off the fetters from the enslaved, to break open the prison door, and to give liberty to the captives. But large as his commission is, the proud, impenitent, and stout-hearted, continuing such, exclude themselves from the benefit of it; for, unless they are brought by the holy law, the ministration of death and condemnation to transgressors, and by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, to know themselves, and humbly submit to God; they will not understand the nature of, or desire the blessings conferred by him, "who came to seek and save that which was lost." Whilst the Gospel is preached to us, "the acceptable year of the "LORD" continues: let then such as have feared to know the worst of themselves, recollect that if they be but duly humbled, Christ will assuredly relieve and comfort them: but let the careless, the infidel, the profligate, the hypocritical take notice, that the day of vengeance of our God is intimately connected with this, his acceptable year. Let none delay, for their limited time of mercy and grace may soon expire: let none despond, who are mourning before God in deep self-abasement; for the gracious Saviour will surely comfort them and render them both joyful and holy: but let none rest in false joy and carnal confidence; for the rejoicing of every true penitent is connected with love and praise, and they are made, "Trees "of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that He "may be glorified." The Lord is pleased, from age to age, to employ those who have been thus convinced, humbled, pardoned, and sanctified by his grace, to execute the ministry of reconciliation betwixt him and their fellow-sinners. They too are sent to comfort the mourners, and to bind up the broken hearted, and to copy the example, as well as to proclaim the Gospel, of their Lord and Saviour. He even employs such persons as instruments of extensive usefulness to his Church: and thus we poor sinners of the Gentiles, are honoured to be "workers toge-"ther with God," for the good of his redeemed people. But we should desire the good and useful, though laborious work of the ministry, more than the honour of being named the priests of the Lord, or than the emolument of eating the riches of the Gentiles. Indeed all believers may glory in being the priests of the Lord, separated and consecrated to offer him spiritual sacrifices, and to draw near unto him: but let none boast themselves in this glory, who do not endeavour to maintain the sanctity, and to do the duty, of their important character. True believers will be doubly honoured for all their confusion and self-abasement before God, and for all the shame and disgrace that they have suffered from the world; and they that have most despised them, will behold them, (perhaps from afar,) rejoicing in their portion with everlasting joy. The just and heart-searching God cannot be imposed upon by specious hypocrites, or be induced to accept the most costly oblations from those who would thus make him a sharer in their ill-gotten gains; and large donations to pious and charitable uses must be honestly obtained, in order to be accepted of him. But he will not reject the feeblest attempt of the upright believer: he will direct him and his works in the way of his precepts and promises, and teach him how to perform his well-meant services acceptably; and he will ratify and seal unto him his everlasting covenant. This generation is continued as a peculiar people, distinguished by their piety, and zeal for good works, as well as for their joy and confidence in God; and all who impartially observe them may perceive, and should acknowledge, "that "they are a seed that the LORD hath blessed." They may also cheerfully expect that their offspring which they dedicate to him, and bring up for him, shall inherit the same blessings, and be distinguished in the same manner. Every one of them may therefore rejoice greatly in the LORD his God, who hath clothed him with the garments of salvation, even the robe of the Redeemer's righteousness; and admitted him to an union and relation to him, of which the most endeared relations on earth are feeble shadows, and which death, that dissolves all our other unions, shall eternally perfect. Let us seek, first these blessings, rejoice in them, and aim to walk worthy of them: and let us gladly anticipate the time, when righteousness and praise shall spring forth before all the nations of the earth.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXII. V. 1—5. Some commentators suppose that the prophet here speaks in his own name, and in that of the prophets and ministers of God in successive generations: but he seems to have spoken as the type of Christ, and in his name. We may therefore consider the Son of God, as assuring his Church of his unfailing love and care of her and intercession for her, under all trials and difficulties; and that he would never intermit his prevailing pleas and powerful operations in her behalf, till her righteousness and salvation shone forth with the brightness of a lamp, lighted up and burning in a conspicuous place, for the use of all that were in the house. By Zion's righteousness we may understand, either the righteousness by which believers are justified, or the fruits of righteousness by which that justification is evidenced: and her salvation may mean the doctrine of salvation taught in the Church; or the blessings enjoyed by believers as the first fruits of that salvation. These would at length be rendered so abundant and conspicuous, that the Gentiles, yea, all kings would behold her glory in them; and so Zion would be called by a new name, which the Lord would give her. Some understand this of the name of Christians, by which believers are called under the new dispensation: but probably it refers to that change which would take place in her state, which is signified by names afterwards mentioned. Then the Church would become a crown, or diadem, which God would hold in his hand, to show his delight in thus honouring her; and her peace, holiness, and happiness would there be held forth to allure others to come, and seek a share of her blessings. She would no longer be looked upon, and spoken of, as a forsaken or divorced woman, nor her land left desolate, (as Judah had been during the captivity:) but the Lord would honour her by the name of "Hephzi-bah," or My delight is in her; and her land, or the countries occupied by his people, would be called "Beulah," or Married; for the Lord would as openly avow his special favour to his Church, as a man doth for her whom he publicly espouses. Indeed as a young man marrieth a virgin, whom he greatly loves, so would Zion's Restorer marry her, and God would rejoice in his love to her, as the bridegroom over his bride. The word rendered thy Sons may be translated thy Restorer, by altering some of the points; but then the verb being plural, must likewise be altered: and perhaps this is not necessary. The Church is sometimes spoken of as a matron, or as a widow or divorced woman, and then again as a virgin: so that it would not be unprecedented, if the members of the Church should sometimes be considered as her dutiful sons; and at others, as standing in the relation of a husband to her. Such a variation of images must sometimes occur in a style so exceedingly figurative and highly poetical, (according to the bold genius of eastern poetry,) as that of Isaiah. The conversion of Constantine and the prosperity and peace of the Christian Church, after the continued persecutions that she had endured, are supposed by some to be here predicted: and yet the language seems to indicate that still more glorious events are intended.

V. 6, 7. There is no intimation of any change in the speaker; and if we consider the former verses as the words of the Messiah, these verses are the continuation of his discourse. 'The word shomerim,' (watchmen) 'doth properly signify those priests and Levites, who kept watch 'day and night about the temple, and some of them at 'certain hours sung psalms of prayer and praise.' (Lowth.) An allusion may be made to this custom: but "the walls "of Jerusalem," not the courts of the temple, would be thus guarded: and the watchmen on Zion's walls evidently mean the prophets and faithful ministers of Christ, who are employed to give warning of the approach of an enemy, and also to look out for the coming of her expected Deliverer. (Marg. Ref.) These watchmen would be instant in preaching the word, and constant in prayer for the prosperity of the Church; and all believers are exhorted to join with them. They and other believers "make mention "of the LORD," or rather are his remembrancers, to remind him of his promises: and they are exhorted not to keep silence, nor to give him any rest, but importunately to beseech him to perform his word: till he should establish his Church, in righteousness, peace, and truth, and render her the praise and glory of the whole earth. This assuredly is addressed to us also, however we interpret the prophecy. To us likewise it is said, "Let there be no silence "to you; and allow no silence to him until," &c.; according to the emphatical language of the original. 'He 'exhorteth the ministers never to cease to call on God— 'for the deliverance of his Church; and to teach others 'to do the same.'

eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness.

11 Behold, [s] the LORD hath proclaimed unto the end of the world, [t] Say ye to the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy Salvation cometh; behold, [u] his reward is with him, and his * work before him.

12 And they shall call them, [x] The holy people, [y] The redeemed of the LORD: and thou shalt be called, [z] Sought out, a city [a] not forsaken.

V. 8, 9. The Lord is here said to have sworn by his right hand and the arm of his strength, or pledged the honour of his omnipotence, that he will rescue his Church from her enemies. The images are taken from the devastations which were made in Judah, when the enemies of the Jews seized their corn and wine: but when the invaders were vanquished, then they reaped their harvest and vintage, and feasted upon them in the courts of the temple whither they carried their peace-offerings, first-fruits, oblations, &c. And it implies the deliverance of the Christian Church from those persecutors who have often kept from them the word of God, and deprived them of the labours of their ministers by putting them to death, immuring them in prisons, or driving them into foreign countries.—But a blessed change is here predicted, which would be welcomed and improved in a holy and a thankful manner. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—12. The friends and ministers of the Church are here commanded to go through her gates, to cast up an high-way, and to remove every obstruction, that the people might come to Zion from the ends of the earth; and to lift up a standard to give them notice that the time was arrived. (Note, lvii. 14.) For the proclamation was sent forth to the ends of the earth, that Zion's Salvation or Saviour was come. The Lord Jesus was about to receive his full recompense, in becoming the Salvation of God to the ends of the earth, and to perform that great work which is before him; and thenceforth the Church would be called, "an holy people, the redeemed of the "LORD:" being "sought out," or greatly desired by him in her afflictions, and assured of being no more forsaken. Many events have been partial accomplishments of this prediction, especially that before mentioned: but I apprehend these were only earnests of more glorious times that are yet to come. The restoration of the converted Jews to their own land does not seem to be exclusively intended, as some expositors think; but rather the general prevalence of religion throughout the world, is predicted in figurative language.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Whilst we are encouraged by firmly believing the unchangeable love of Christ to his Church, and his uninterrupted intercession in her behalf, in which he will steadily persevere, 'till her righteousness and salvation are ren-'dered most conspicuous and glorious;' we should in our several stations imitate his example. The interests of true religion should be near our hearts, and we should be willing to spend and be spent in promoting them, without seeking our own credit or emolument: we should be unwearied in doing good, and wait for our rest in heaven: we should think nothing done, whilst so much remains undone: and be encouraged to expect, and pray for, greater success, by every degree that is vouchsafed us. Our first object should be to promote the purity of the Church, in doctrine and practice, and her internal peace and unity: for when the Gospel of salvation, through the righteousness of Christ and by the sanctification of the Spirit, are clearly professed, and solidly preached and vindicated; and when the holy lives and mutual love of those who profess and preach them, adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things: then the righteousness of Zion shines forth, as a lamp that burneth; and her brightness makes way for the wider diffusion of divine knowledge. But her glory and excellency must become very conspicuous, before all kings and nations can behold it: and therefore zealous endeavours to increase knowledge, holiness, and union among professed Christians, tend as much to bring forward the great triumphs of the Gospel, as promoting missions into the remote and benighted regions of the earth. When the scandals of the Church shall be removed and her breaches healed, she will appear as "the perfection of beauty," and be called by a new name: and all that behold her excellency and felicity, and the special favour of God to her, will find their hearts allured to seek a share in her privileges. Whilst we admire the happiness of the Church, (constituted of redeemed sinners, yea, reconciled enemies,) in being the object of the Lord's delight, and as married unto him: let us also adore his infinite condescension and love. We may all aspire to these honours; and, coming in Christ's name, we shall not be refused or forsaken; but we should well consider the reciprocal duties that result from such high relations and obligations, that we may thence deduce motives to faithfulness, obedience, submission, and the most entire and devoted attachment. If God rejoiceth over us and over his Church, as a bridegroom rejoiceth over his bride; surely we should rejoice in his favour and service, and desire no other happiness: and as the true sons of the Church, we should heartily espouse her interests, and seek her peace and prosperity. Some of us the Lord employs as watchmen to defend the walls of Zion: let us then be watchful and faithful, instant in preaching, fervent in prayer, patient in enduring hardship, wholly giving ourselves to the work of the ministry.—Others are the Lord's remembrancers: let them recollect that he loves to be reminded of his promises and predictions; that he delights in their importunity; and that he commands them "not to keep silence, and to give him no "rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a

"praise in the earth." We should thankfully acknowledge, that he hath already, in part, fulfilled these engagements. He hath founded a Church, to the honour of his name, in this distant part of the world; and at present, he preserves it from oppression and persecution: he no longer suffers our adversaries to lock up from us the Holy Scriptures, which are as food and as cordials for our souls; or to pervert them to their own base purposes. We have the full comfort and benefit of public ordinances, of the labours of his ministers, and of every means of edification. Let us be thankful for these mercies, and for all our distinguished temporal advantages, and use them all in a sanctified manner. Let us delight in attending on his courts, that we may enjoy the consolations of his Spirit: and let us remember that his almighty arm is engaged to effect all that yet remaineth to be done; and that he hath confirmed it with an oath, for our fuller assurance. Let us also endeavour by our examples, prayers, and the improvement of our talents, to open Zion's gates, to prepare her ways, to remove obstructions, to forward the admission of citizens, and the lifting up of the standard of the cross, to call them in. Soon it shall be proclaimed in its fullest sense, "Say ye to the daughter of "Zion, behold, thy Salvation cometh!" The Lord Jesus will accomplish his work, and his success will be his most valued recompense: and then all, who name his name, shall be acknowledged to be a holy people, and his Church to be "sought out, a city not forsaken," as it hath long appeared to be. And we are sure that he will never forsake one whom he hath redeemed and sanctified; and that the cause he favours will surely prevail.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXIII. V. 1—6. These verses contain a prophetical representation of the victories of Christ over the enemies of his Church; for of him the passage must be interpreted, nor can we admit of so much as an accommodation of it to any other. But it is remarkable, that many interpreters have understood it of the sufferings of Christ, and of his being covered with his own blood: though nothing can be more evident, than that he is represented by the prophet as covered with the blood of his enemies, and as a mighty Conqueror and Avenger; and not as a Lamb slain for a sacrifice. Whoever considers attentively what hath been proposed on a parallel Scripture, (Notes, xxxiv.) will probably be convinced that Edom, and Bozrah, (the chief city of Edom,) are here to be understood mystically; and that the destruction of the chief city of the Antichristian powers, and of all that pertinaciously adhere to her, are here predicted, and that no other events fully answer to the description; though the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, and that of the Roman Emperors and armies, about the time of Constantine's advancement to the imperial throne, have been mentioned by eminent interpreters as a partial accomplishment of it. 'Though this prophecy must have its 'accomplishment, there is no necessity of supposing that 'it has been already accomplished. There are prophecies, 'which intimate a great slaughter of the enemies of God, '—which remain yet to be fulfilled. This prophecy may 'refer to the same or the like event.' (Bp. Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.) The prophet, in vision, beholds the Messiah, returning in triumph from the conquest of his enemies, (of whom Edom was a type;) and being struck with his majestic appearance, he inquires, Who this is, thus returning from Bozrah, with his garments stained with blood: being arrayed in glorious apparel, as some mighty Prince; and travelling, not as one wearied with the combat, but in the greatness of his strength, and as able and prepared to vanquish every opposing power? To this, Messiah answers, that it is He, the Judge, that gives sentence in righteousness against his enemies, performs all his promises, and is mighty to save his Church.—The prophet again inquires, Wherefore his apparel was discoloured, and why he appeared like one that had been treading the purple grapes in the wine-press? (Notes, Ez. xxxviii. xxxix. Rev. xiv. 19, 20. xix. 11—21.) To which Messiah answers, that he had been treading the wine-press of the wrath of God, and that by his own power, without any human help, he had crushed his obstinate opposers; and that he would thus trample upon them all, in his fury and indignation, and would account their blood, staining his garments, as honourable to his justice, truth, and power; for the day of vengeance was in his heart, or was determined on, as pleasing to him; being the appointed season of rescuing his Church of redeemed sinners from oppression; (lxi. 2.) He had indeed looked for some to stand forth to protect his people and uphold his cause, and he marvelled that there was none; and therefore his own arm effected the intended salvation, and his hot displeasure sustained him in taking vengeance on her enemies; and that this was but an earnest of the full end that he would make of all who opposed him and his cause. The event will best determine, whether these predictions are to be understood literally or not. 'Things were come to that 'extremity, that there was no appearance of succour by 'any human means. Those who, by their office and cha'racter, ought to have stood up in defence of oppressed 'truth and innocence, betrayed so good a cause, or had 'not courage to defend it.' "I have trodden down the "people in my anger:" 'this agrees better with the con'text.' 'God's judgments are often represented as an 'intoxicating cup; because they astonish men, and deprive 'them of their usual discretion.' (Lowth.)

V. 7, 8. It hath been observed, that it is probable the destruction of the Antichristian powers will make way for the conversion of the Jews: and it is very reasonably concluded by the most eminent interpreters, that the subsequent part of this chapter, and the whole of the next, are intended as a kind of directory to their prayers on that occasion.—'The remaining part of this chapter, and the whole chap'ter following, contain a penitential confession and sup'plication of the Israelites, in their present state of dis'persion. It seems designed as a formulary of humiliation 'for the Israelites, in order to their conversion.' (Bp. Lowth.) The prophet, or the nation as represented by him, determines to mention the peculiar favours of God to Israel, from his exuberant love and mercy, as worthy of their praises and thanksgivings. When they solemnly acceded to the covenant proposed to them at Mount Sinai, the Lord proceeded to deal with them as his people and children; as if he had been assured that they would not prevaricate in so solemn an engagement, or deal deceitfully with him. This is spoken after the manner of men, and implies that He had given them no cause for their falsehood and apostacy.

V. 9. The Lord interested himself in all the afflictions of Israel, even as if he had shared in their sufferings: and the only begotten Son of the Father, became the Angel or Messenger of his love, in and by whom his special presence attended them for their preservation and salvation, not only from Egypt to Canaan, but also through their successive generations: and thus he compassionately redeemed and bare them, with the patience, assiduity, and tenderness, with which a nursing mother carries, and tends upon, her beloved infant. (Marg. Ref.) 'The Angel of 'his covenant, (who still appears before his face to intercede 'for his Church,) saved them.' (Bp. Hall.) 'The Septu'agint, joining the latter part of the eighth verse with the 'ninth, translate the whole passage agreeably to the pre'sent Hebrew text;' 'He was their Saviour out of all 'their trouble. It was not a messenger, nor an angel, 'but himself delivered them.' 'The Angel, who con'ducted them by the pillar of fire and cloud, was no other 'than the Logos, or second Person of the blessed Trinity.' —'The Person who led the people through the wilder'ness, could be no created being; though he is some'times called an Angel, because he took on him the office 'and ministry of angels, as he afterwards took on him 'the form of a servant.' (Lowth.) (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10. Israel was rebellious from their leaving Egypt through all the ages that they continued the professed people of God: they provoked him by their murmurs, idolatries, and multiplied crimes: they resisted and vexed or grieved his Holy Spirit, by despising and persecuting his prophets; and especially by rejecting and crucifying their promised Messiah; and opposing the Gospel, when preached by the apostles, with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven to attest their doctrine by his miraculous operations: thus, God, who had before been their Friend and fought for them, became their dreadful enemy, and fought against them by the Romans, to the destruction of their city; and since that time by various instruments even to this present day.

V. 11—14 It is not agreed, whether God, or the nation of Israel be here spoken of in the beginning of this passage: but if we adhere to our version, it is more obvious to understand it of the Jews, in their rejected condition, calling to remembrance the Lord's ancient mercies to their forefathers, and again inquiring after him. Some of that people, being made sensible of the wrath of God against them, and reflecting how his power had been exercised in behalf of their fathers, and what promises had been made to them, begin seriously to inquire, Where He is who showed such wonders of power and love to Moses and his people? Where is the Lord, who brought Israel up out of the Red Sea, with those to whom he had committed them, as a flock to the care of a shepherd, but who could not have delivered either themselves or the people? Where is He that put his Holy Spirit upon the seventy Elders, to enable them to assist Moses in his too arduous work? Who led the vast multitude of Israel through the deep channel of the Red Sea, (the waters of which he divided by his power, for the glory of his name,) with as much safety and as little obstruction, as a horse passeth in the open plains; and who afterwards led them through the wilderness to the rest and plenty of Canaan, as the beast goeth down, after the labour of the day, to feed and lie down in the fruitful valley? Would this mighty God of Jacob no more glorify his name, in delivering his ancient people from their calamities?

V. 15—19. These meditations are represented as exciting the hopes and fears of the penitent Jews: and here are words prepared for them to take with them, in returning unto the Lord. They are therefore introduced, as beseeching him to look down from his holy habitation on the abject condition of their once favoured nation: they inquire, Where is his zeal for his own glory, his power heretofore exerted in their favour, and his tender compassions for them in their troubles? Were they for ever restrained? They plead, that even if Abraham and Israel should disown them, or knew not of them, or could afford them no help in their misery: yet doubtless he would remember his relation to them, and be their Father and Redeemer; for his name, (his perfections,) was everlasting and unchangeable. Why then had he so long left the nation to be judicially hardened and blinded, estranged from his fear, and given up to error, unbelief, and obstinacy? Would it not be more glorious to his name to remove the veil from the hearts of his chosen inheritance, to return to their tribes, and to remember his ancient servants the fathers of their nation?—We suppose a remnant of the Jews to plead thus in behalf of their unbelieving brethren. And they further urge, that the people, whom God had separated from the nations to be his holy worshippers, had possessed the promised land comparatively for a very short season; and their adversaries had long trodden down their holy city and temple. Yet they were still his people, "beloved for their fathers' sake;" whereas the Romans, who destroyed the city and temple, and the nations that have since trodden them down, were never subject to him, or called by his name. The whole tenour of the prophecy evinces, that the Babylonish captivity, and the consequent deliverance of the Jews, were only shadows of the events here predicted. (Marg. Ref.) Some render the last verse, "We have long been as those whom thou hast not ruled; "who have not been called by thy name." 'Thou hast 'rejected us altogether, and dost disregard us as if we had 'never had any relation to thee, nor ever were called thy 'people: which sense agrees very well with the present 'condition of the Jewish nation, which has continued for 'many ages, without king, or prince, or sacrifice.' (Hos. iii. 4.) (Lowth.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—6.

Our divine Redeemer will appear glorious in the eyes of all holy creatures, when he displays his power and justice in taking vengeance on his obstinate enemies, as well as when he shows himself mighty to save his people. And though he deigns not to answer the arrogant, cavilling questions of proud infidels, he will fully satisfy humble believers of the propriety and equity of his most awful judgments. Once he appeared on earth in apparent weakness, to pour out his precious blood as the atonement for our sins: but he will in due time appear "travelling in "the greatness of his strength," and covered with the blood of his enemies. No numbers or power can secure them against his righteous indignation: nor will he need any helpers in this tremendous work; any more than he did, when "his own self bare our sins in his own body "on the tree." His single arm suffices to apply, as his single sacrifice did to procure, salvation; and his powerful and righteous indignation will uphold him in executing vengeance on his adversaries: yet he may well complain that amongst the numbers who call themselves his disciples, there are scarcely any that stand prepared to be zealous instruments in promoting his cause. But the acceptable year of the Lord is yet proclaimed, though the day of vengeance be in his heart, and the vintage which is to be trodden in the wine-press ripens apace: let then sinners in general, and the opposers of Scriptural Christianity in particular, take warning and seek reconciliation with their offended Judge: or he will tread them down in his anger, make them drunk in his fury, and bring down their strength to the earth; and by their example he will bring others to repent and seek his face.

V. 7—19.

No sufferings should induce us to forget, or not to mention the praises of the Lord, and his mercies to us and to his people, which have been numberless, and infinite, like his essential goodness. All our comforts and hopes spring from this source, and all our miseries and fears from our sins. Every one of the human species receives unmerited mercies from our God; but they are most favoured who enjoy the benefit of his word and ordinances. He acts towards his professed people, as if they were, and would be sincere, and rescues them from many dangers and troubles; till their iniquity or apostacy proves that they were dissemblers. But how great is his mercy towards those that really fear and trust in him! Who are indeed his children, and neither dissemble with him, nor with their brethren, but copy his example of truth and faithfulness. He is become their Saviour; he pities them as a Father doth his children; he interests himself in all their concerns, even as if he shared their sufferings; and they, who persecute or despise them, are accounted his despisers and persecutors also. The Angel of his presence, the Messenger of the covenant, who "was in the form of God, and thought "it not robbery to be equal with God," assumed the form of a servant, that in our nature he might bear our griefs and carry our sorrows; and he so loveth those whom he hath thus redeemed by his blood, and taught to trust in and love him, that he bears and carries them with the most unwearied patience. Yet, alas! in many instances, they too are rebellious, and grieve his Holy Spirit, lose their comforts, and expose themselves to sharp rebukes and corrections; by which they are brought to renewed repentance and deeper humiliation. But the Lord never becomes their enemy, to fight against them, as he doth against those who so vex his Holy Spirit, that he will no more strive with them. Yet whatever a man's sins have been, if he so remembers the Lord's mercies, as to be humbled for his ingratitude, and yet be encouraged to hope in his mercy, there is ground to conclude that he is discovering the way of peace. When sinners inquire after him, who hath in other ages glorified himself in saving and feeding his purchased flock, and hath given his Holy Spirit to qualify his ministers and prosper their labours; and when they call to mind his wonderful works of old, in order thence to deduce arguments to plead with him in prayer, that he may glorify himself in saving them also; they are evidently profiting by the sacred records: for whenever we look up by humble faith and hope to the Lord, in the habitation of his holiness and glory, he will be sure to look down upon us in kindness and mercy. His zeal, power, and compassions are no more restrained, than in former ages: and should any become so vile, that the most eminent saints should reject or despair of them; yet if God see them truly humbled and fervent in prayer, he will doubtless be their Father and Redeemer, for the everlasting glory of his name. Spiritual judgments, by which men are made to err from the ways, and are hardened against the fear of God, are more to be dreaded than any other calamities; and we should most carefully avoid those sins which provoke the Lord to leave men thus to themselves and to the deceiver, which he never doth without just cause. But when any become sensible that they have verged to this dreadful case, they are in a hopeful way to be preserved from it: and they may confidently beg of God to open their eyes, understandings, and hearts; and he will assuredly accept their petitions. Nay, such persons are proper supplicants for others in the same community or family, who are in the same awful situation. Thus, we are assured, that the Lord will shortly break in upon the blindness of the Jewish nation, and return in mercy to those tribes of his inheritance. Indeed, if all the promises made to their fathers had received their whole accomplishment in the short-lived prosperity of Israel in Canaan, it might well be considered as beneath the largeness of the terms employed. But all the blessings vouchsafed to the true Israel of God, through Christ the promised Seed, in every age, are also to be included: and unknown blessings are yet reserved for that distinguished nation. And, however God may permit his adversaries to tread down his sanctuary, or to triumph over his people, yet he will hear the prayers of those who belong to him, and deliver them from those over whom he hath not borne rule, and who have never been called by his name.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXIV. V. 1—3. This chapter continues the prayer begun in the preceding; which has been interpreted to be that of the first converts made from among the dispersed Jews, when that nation is about to be reinstated in the Church. These supplicants perceive vast obstacles in the way of their desires being granted, especially from the power of their oppressors and adversaries: but they most earnestly call upon God to appear and remove them all. They long for him to rend the visible heavens in some awful manner, and to melt the mountains, that they might flow down as water at his presence; which he could do with the same facility as the fire melteth the wax, or the metal; or even as it causeth the water to boil. Thus, he could make his name known to his adversaries, and put whole nations to confusion and consternation before him. And this would be no unprecedented favour: for when he delivered Israel out of Egypt, he did such terrible things, to crush the power of their oppressors, as they had never looked for or conceived an idea of; insomuch that opposing difficulties, apparently like immoveable mountains, melted and vanished at his presence; and they only entreat a similar interposition, in order again to set them at liberty, and to reinstate them in their privileges. The commotion of Mount Sinai, when the Lord came down upon it, is referred to, in this allusion to their former deliverances. (Marg. Ref.) 'The words will bear another 'interpretation, which agrees better with what follows:' "When men shall do terrible and unexpected things,— "the mountains shall melt at thy presence." (Lowth.)

V. 4. No man, from the beginning of the world, had heard, seen, or conceived an idea of any thing so great, glorious, or excellent, as what God himself had devised and prepared for those that waited for him; and the displays of the divine power and glory, which the people of God yet wait for, will far exceed all that hitherto hath been experienced, witnessed, or recorded since the beginning: and can only be properly conceived of by God himself. Some explain the verse to mean that no people had ever heard or conceived of any other God, except JEHOVAH, who had wrought such wonders for his people. St. Paul quotes the sense, (though not the exact words of it,) with reference to the blessings of redemption by the death of Christ: and perhaps the leading idea here may be, that nothing too great can be expected from that incomprehensible love which hath provided such a salvation for sinful men. (Marg. Ref.) In many places the inspired writers of the New Testament quote from the Septuagint: but in this, and many other instances, where that version materially varies from the Hebrew, they do not. They give the sense of the passage referred to, as applicable to the subject before them: but do not confine themselves to a strictly literal translation. The expression, "As it is written," uniformly in the New Testament, means a reference to the sacred writings, "the oracles of God," and revered as such by the Jews.

V. 5. 'Thou hast heretofore given merciful proofs of 'thy favour to our forefathers, who rejoiced in thee and 'walked holily before thee: and so thou art ready to do 'to those who awfully and thankfully adore thee in thy 'ways of justice and mercy. But thou art displeased with 'us, for we have done wickedly before thee; whereas, if 'we had the grace to continue in those ways of thine, we 'should be sure to be saved.' (Bp. Hall.) 'Thou show-'edst favour toward our fathers, when they trusted in 'thee, and walked after thy commandments:' 'they con-'sidered thy mercies.' "In them is continuance;" that is, 'in thy mercies, which he calleth the ways of the Lord.' (Ps. xxv. 10.) "Thou hast met him who rejoiced and 'wrought righteousness: these" (all of this character in every age,) "will remember thee in thy ways. Behold, "thou art angry, for we have sinned: in these," (in thy ways,) "is perpetuity, and we shall be saved," or "may "be saved." This is a literal translation of the verse, which is considered by Bishop Lowth as inexplicable without entirely conjectural alterations of the text. "The "mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting "upon them that fear him." (Ps. ciii. 17. Luke i. 50.) "He waits" perpetually on his mercy-seat, "to be gra-"cious;" "he meets" his worshippers through every generation, in his ordinances. In these is perpetuity; they are not like the changeable fashions and customs of men: and therefore, though the God of Israel had been wroth with his people for their sins, yet they had now begun to seek him, as the God who had met and blessed their fathers, when they rejoiced in obeying and serving him, and they trusted that he would meet and save them also. The original word rendered continuance, means an indefinite duration, the beginning or termination of which is hidden from man.

7 And [u] there is none that calleth upon thy name, that stirreth up himself [x] to take hold of thee: for thou [y] hast hid thy face from us, and hast * consumed us, because of our iniquities.

8 But now, O LORD, [z] thou art our Father: we [a] are the clay, and thou our Potter; and we [b] all are the work of thy hand.

9 Be not [c] wroth very sore, O LORD, neither [d] remember iniquity for ever: behold, see, we beseech thee, [e] we are all thy people.

10 Thy [f] holy cities are a wilderness, Zion is a wilderness, Jerusalem a desolation.

11 Our [g] holy and our beautiful house [h] where our fathers praised thee, is burned up with fire: and [i] all our pleasant things are laid waste.

12 Wilt [k] thou refrain thyself for these things, O LORD? wilt thou hold thy peace, and afflict us very sore?

V. 6—8. 'The best actions of the best men have a great 'alloy of imperfection. When the Hebrew language 'would express the most excellent in its kind, it makes use 'of the plural. Here righteousnesses is the most perfect 'righteousness man can attain to.' (Lowth.) The converted remnant, supplicating in behalf of the Jews, are evidently taught to confess their own sins, as well as those of the nation in every age. Instead of "the people of God's "holiness," as they were by profession, "they were all "as an unclean thing." Instead of the robe of righteousness and salvation before spoken of, (lxi. 10) "all their "righteous deeds were as a rejected garment," (Lowth.) a garment thrown away as polluted and worthless. Not only the moral, ritual, or traditional works, by which they had long sought to justify themselves, in neglect of the Saviour and his righteousness, were abominable: because proud, hypocritical, and unbelieving: but even their present endeavours to seek and serve God, were so imperfect and mixed with defilement, that they were wholly unmeet to form a robe, in which to appear in his holy presence. A singular noun, like that plural here rendered "filthy rags," is frequently rendered ornament, or ornaments (xlix. 18. Ex. xxxiii. 4, 5, 6. 2 Sam. i. 24. Ez. xvii. 7—11:) and some would so render it in this place; and explain it exclusively of "works done to be seen of men;" 'ostenta-'tious, hypocritical, and vain-glorious services, designed 'both to acquire human applause, and make compensa-'tion for the want of true holiness.' But this construction seems contrary to most if not all the old versions; the expression, "all our righteousnesses are as ornaments," (for there is no epithet) is obscure and ambiguous; and these penitents, in confessing their own sins and those of their nation, are supposed only to mean the sins of their past lives, or present actual transgressions, without any humiliating acknowledgment of the imperfection found in their repentance, prayers, and best services. How far it is proper for Christians to adopt the strong language of our translation, in respect of those righteousnesses which are the "fruits of the Spirit," is another question. "The "fruits of the Spirit" are in themselves most excellent; but the good works which the best of men perform, are not the unmingled "fruits of the Spirit;" for the remainder of indwelling sin greatly alloys them. And the more humble and spiritual men become, the greater abhorrence have they of this corrupt alloy; the more they notice, lament, and confess it; and the readier they are, without affectation or direct intention, to use the most humiliating language of Scripture concerning themselves and their services. (Marg. Ref.) But, however this may be determined, because of these things the prosperity of Israel was as a withered leaf; their iniquities had been as the wind to scatter them abroad throughout the earth; and there was scarcely one of them who heartily called upon God, or exerted himself to lay hold by faith on his power, truth, and love: for he had hid his face from them, and they were consumed or dissolved because of their iniquities. Yet they would still plead with the Lord, as their heavenly Father; they confided in his wisdom and mercy; and being the work of his creating power as individuals, and as his chosen nation, they were willing to be disposed of at his pleasure, like clay in the hand of the potter.

V. 9—12. The supplicants here continue to deprecate the extremity of the Lord's displeasure, and his perpetual remembrance of their sins: they still plead with him, as his chosen people, and call upon him to consider the desolations of their land. The cities, once inhabited by his worshippers, are now either entirely destroyed, or inhabited by infidels and idolaters; especially Jerusalem their holy city, and their temple with all its furniture and ordinances are utterly wasted: and would not the Lord be satisfied with these their miseries? Would he still refrain from interposing? Would he reject their prayers, and persist in his hot displeasure to afflict them? All these circumstances fix the prophetical meaning to the Jewish nation, rather than to the Christian Church. And the desolations and miseries of the Jews, since their rejection of the Gospel, have so far exceeded, in degree and continuance, all that they before endured, that, though we need not exclude the Babylonish captivity, or the ravages and profanations of Antiochus Epiphanes, yet we must consider their condition from the days of Christ to the present time at length to terminate in their conversion, as the grand accomplishment of these predictions.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The difficulties which occur in our path or work, should excite us to more vigorous exercises of faith in the omnipotence of God, and to more fervent prayers for his interposition; for when he pleases to rend the heavens and come down, the most insuperable obstacles remove in an instant; and we can never want a prevalent plea with

CHAP. LXV.

JEHOVAH declares his grace in the conversion of the Gentiles, and his justice in casting off the Jews for their unbelief, idolatry, and wickedness, 1—7: shows that he preserved the nation for the sake of a chosen seed to arise out of it; and contrasts the blessedness of his servants with the miseries coming on the unbelieving Jews, 8—15: predicts the glories and privileges of the Church in the latter days, 16—25.

I AM [a] sought of them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, [b] Behold me, behold me, [c] unto a nation that was not called by my name.

2 I have [d] spread out my hands all the day unto [e] a rebellious people, [f] which walketh in a way that was not good, [g] after their own thoughts; him thus to interpose, when we are seeking the glory of his name, and the enlargement or prosperity of his Church: for he will assuredly "make his name known to his ad- "versaries, that the nations may tremble at his presence," (Rev. i. 7.) The deliverances, which the Lord works for his people, are sometimes as unexpected, in the manner and season of them, as his terrible judgments on his enemies. The sacred records of the ancient Church have been transmitted to us, to encourage our hopes and prayers, for personal and public mercies according to the promises, and the nature of our dispensation. But who hath heard, or seen, or conceived any thing equal to his love in sending his Son to be the propitiation for our sins? Can we really believe this truth, and then think any thing too great to expect from his power, truth, and mercy? We have very faint conceptions of the glorious things which are prepared for his Church on earth; and our ideas of the felicities of heaven are still more inadequate: let us then trust in his word, and patiently wait for him to terminate our sorrows and complete our joys. If he have taught us to rejoice in working righteousness, and to remember him in his ways, he will doubtless meet us with supports and comforts in his ordinances, and perfect his work in us. And though we have grievously sinned, and provoked him to anger: yet Jesus continually intercedeth; the way of access and acceptance is always open; and they, who come to the Father by it, shall be saved to the uttermost, and for ever. But we must confess, that by nature "we are all "as an unclean thing, and that all our righteousnesses are "as filthy rags." Thus it was with every one of us, when strangers or enemies to him: and even now, our few good works, in which there is real excellency as the fruits of the Spirit, are so defective and defiled as performed by us, that they need to be washed in the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. They, therefore, who confide in their own merits will fade as a leaf, and will be driven by the wrath of God against their iniquities into eternal misery. But, alas, how few are there who appear to call on the Lord with their whole hearts, or stir themselves up to lay hold of him! Without this earnestness we cannot hope to prevail; but the vilest prodigal, who being "come to himself," desires to return to God with humble confessions and supplications, may approach him as a Father, and plead with him, as the work of his hands; nor need he hesitate to cast himself unreservedly on his sovereign mercy, to be disposed of as he pleases. This seems to unbelief a desperate venture, but it is in fact our only safety; for in this manner we engage all the promises and perfections of God on our side; which are all against us whilst we refuse unreserved submission, urge any self-excusing plea, or allow any other confidence. But it well consists with this unreserved submission, to deprecate the severity of God's deserved wrath, and to pray to be visited with the salvation of his people. Even they who are consciously unworthy to ask the least favour for themselves in their own name, will be most graciously accepted, when they plead, in the name of Christ, for their fellow sinners and for the Church of God: and though he may delay for a time the answer of their prayers to exercise their humble faith and patience; yet he will not always "refrain himself and hold his "peace, or afflict very sore" any of those who call upon his name and hope in his mercy.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXV. V. 1, 2. The preceding chapter might seem to intimate, that God had treated the Jewish nation with great severity: but in this he answers the supplicants, and shows them the reasons of his past conduct, as well as his gracious purposes in future towards them, and the Church in general. The subject is so arranged, that the Lord seems to have the whole nation of Israel and all their generations present before him, and sometimes to address one company and sometimes another: because they have been treated with such marked severity, for their rebellions, during the whole time that they continued the professed people of God, and not for the sins of any one generation exclusively. St. Paul quotes these verses, to show God's purpose of calling the Gentiles, and casting off the unbelieving Jews. And the Lord here seems to mention this part of his conduct, to show that he did not reject the Jews for want of a disposition to mercy, though he acted according to his wise and holy sovereignty in the exercise of it. The heathen nations did not seek after him, nor call on him, nor were they called by his name; yet, without their solicitation, the preachers of the Gospel were sent among them. Thus was he "sought of" or "made "known to," them that asked not for him; and "he "was found of them that sought him not:" for when they were pursuing their sinful projects, and devoted to their idols, without knowing or thinking any thing about him, he demanded their attention, called on them to look to him for salvation and happiness, and disposed their hearts to obey the call: and thus he showed towards them the unsearchable riches of his grace. 'The Gentiles, which [i] knew not God should seek after him, when he had [k] moved their hearts with his Holy Spirit.' But the Jews had these blessings continually proposed to them; and Christ and his apostles invited them first to accept of his salvation. Thus JEHOVAH spread forth his hands full of mercies, and earnestly exhorted them to accept of them, and he persevered in this all the day long; but they persisted in their rebellion, and preferred their own vain devices and evil ways; their sadducean infidelity, their pharisaical hypocrisy and traditions; and their ambition, covetousness, and iniquity, to all the blessings of the gospel and the kingdom of the Messiah: and thus they justly merited to be cast off, and to experience all the miseries which have since overtaken them.

V. 3—7. No doubt the Lord guided the mind of his prophet, to draw the character of the Jews in such a manner that it might serve for a reproof of the people in his own times, as well as for the warning of after ages. They were a people that continually provoked God in the most avowed manner, even in his more immediate presence, at Jerusalem and the temple. In contempt of his law, they would sacrifice in gardens and on high places: nay, they would burn incense also, upon altars of brick or tile, or on the tops of their houses; though this ought to have been done by none but the priests, within the sanctuary on the golden altar, or on their censers. Because God had made the touch of a dead body, or grave, a ceremonial uncleanness, they would abide and even lodge among the tombs, for some superstitious or idolatrous purposes, or as using witchcraft or necromancy; and, despising his authority, they ate swine's flesh, and carried even the broth made of unclean meats, or parts of the abominable sacrifices, to their idols, in their vessels, perhaps for acceptable presents to their friends. These were evidences of their self-will, and preference of their own inventions to the appointments of God, and of their carnal enmity to him and his holy service. Yet, at the same time, they were full of a proud opinion of their superior sanctity, and despised others as unworthy to come near them. This hateful temper was peculiarly prevalent among the Pharisees, especially in the days of Christ: and, notwithstanding their hypocrisy and iniquity, they deemed themselves the only favourites of heaven, and could disdainfully say to a poor heathen, or publican, or harlot, even when penitently crying for mercy, 'Stand off, keep thy distance, I am holier than 'thou.' These were most offensive to the Lord: even as the smoke is offensive to the man who has it continually under his nose. The nearer they were to him, the more he abhorred them: and thus they kindled his indignation, and rendered it as a fire that burneth all the day. Their sins from age to age being written before him, he would not always keep silence, but would certainly recompense upon that generation, who crucified Christ and rejected his gospel, all the iniquities of their fathers, as well as their own transgressions: and as their posterity have ever since persisted in the same spirit of enmity to Christ, they have inherited as a legacy this sentence denounced upon that generation. The swine was the most common sacrifice among idolaters; and therefore more abhorred by conscientious Jews, than any other unclean animal. By "the "broth of abominable things," many understand the kid seethed in his mother's milk, which is repeatedly forbidden in the law. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 8—10. In the tender bunch of grapes, which being unripe is at present of no value, the new wine is contained as in embryo; and therefore the owner gives orders that it should not be destroyed, because a blessing is in it. Thus the Jewish nation hath been preserved, through many generations, for the sake of those believers, that shall hereafter arise from it: and it is preserved a distinct people, that all men may witness this remarkable accomplishment of ancient prophecies and promises. Had not the Lord kept this mercy in store for the remote posterity of "his "servants," Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, he would have destroyed the whole nation by the Romans and others, when they were cast out of the Church, (Matt. xxiv. 22.) But he had determined in process of time to bring a spiritual seed out of Jacob, to inherit the privileges of his true

11 ¶ But ye are [f] they that forsake the LORD, [g] that forget my holy mountain, that [h] prepare a table for that * troop, and that furnish the drink-offering unto that † number.

12 Therefore [i] will I number you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to the slaughter: [k] because when I called, ye did not answer; when I spake, ye did not hear: but [l] did evil before mine eyes, [m] and did choose that wherein I delighted not.

13 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD, Behold, [n] my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry: behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty: behold, [o] my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed:

14 Behold, [p] my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but [q] ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for ‡ vexation of spirit.

people on earth and in heaven. Of these Canaan was a type: and these privileges may be denoted by Sharon and Achor, two distant parts of the land, feeding flocks and herds for their use; when they returned to seek the Lord. —It seems evident that the Jews, when converted, will be restored to their own land, and enjoy its productions as in ancient days. There was indeed "a remnant, ac- "cording to the election of grace," reserved when the nation was rejected: but the events above mentioned seem more immediately predicted. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 11, 12. The Lord here addresses the idolatrous Jews, who willingly forgot mount Zion, to offer sacrifices to a whole troop, a vast number of worthless idols; furnishing out a table and feasting together in honour of them. Or the words Gad and Meni, translated troop and number, may be names of some idols. 'The holy 'Scriptures did not deign to explain more clearly what 'these objects of idolatrous worship were; but chose ra- 'ther that the memory of the knowledge of them should 'be utterly abolished: and God be praised, that they are 'so totally abolished, that we are quite at a loss to know 'what, and what sort of things they were.' (Schimidius in Bp. Lowth.) What perverse pains then do many learned men bestow to bring them again to light; and to explain that which we should be thankful is almost wholly forgotten! But these abominations are so consigned to oblivion, that the meaning of the sacred writers cannot be ascertained. Though the Jews, in the days of Christ and in succeeding ages, did not commit such idolatries; yet they manifested the same spirit of rebellion, perverseness, and enmity to God. He therefore adds, that he would number them to the sword, as criminals ordered for execution, and like them they should bow down to be slaughtered: because when Christ and his apostles called them, they would not answer nor be obedient, but continued in those things, in which he could not delight; that is, such as he utterly abhorred.

V. 13—15. When the Romans were about to besiege Jerusalem, the Christians, perceiving the signals of approaching desolations, and obeying the directions of their Lord, left the devoted city and land; but the bulk of the nation, pertinaciously defending themselves, endured the extremest miseries. Thus the Christians were well provided for in all respects, and rendered abundantly joyful in the Lord, while the Jews were perishing with hunger and thirst, and howling with anguish and despair. Nay, so great were their obstinacy and their misery, that the chosen servants of God could think of no more dreadful curse, to deprecate from themselves and their friends, than the judicial blindness and hardness of heart, the wickedness and punishment of a Jew. In a short time millions were slain, by one dire massacre after another; the nation was cut off from being the people of God; and Jews no longer was the distinguishing appellation of JEHOVAH's worshippers, but he hath called his servants by another name, even by that of Christians.

V. 16. The introduction of the Christian dispensation and the rejection of the Jews, made way for the propagation of true religion among the nations, which could not so well be done, whilst the Jews continued the peculiar people of God, and the worship of the temple was maintained. So that the events, before predicted, came to pass, in order that men in every part of the earth might bless themselves in the name of the God of truth, or seek happiness from him; and that they might swear by his name as his worshippers, and not by that of any idol: and the truth of the Scriptures being clearly demonstrated, by the accomplishment of these prophecies, would both conduce to the conviction of the nations, lead them to regard JEHOVAH as a God of truth, worthy to be feared and trusted, and excite them to imitate his truth in their professions and engagements. This may have some reference to the success of the Gospel amongst the nations, in the days of the apostles and in the subsequent ages: but it more immediately relates to the time, when the troubles of the Church shall be passed, and as it were forgotten; and when God will forgive, and no more look upon the sins which occasioned them: when the Jews shall again be called into the Church, and the fulness of the Gentiles be converted. 'The Hebrew reads 'AMEN; so the expressions' ("the God of truth,") 'may 'properly be understood of Christ, who is "the true "God," (1 John v. 20,) and called AMEN, or the Truth, 17 ¶ For, behold, [a] I create new heavens and a new earth: and [b] the former shall not be remembered, nor come * into mind.

18 But [c] be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy.

19 And [d] I will rejoice in Jerusalem, and joy in my people: and [e] the voice of weeping shall be no more heard in her, nor the voice of crying.

20 There [f] shall be no more thence an infant of days nor an old man that hath not filled his days: for the child shall die an hundred years old; [g] but the sinner, being an hundred years old, shall be accursed.

'blessings shall be derived from him.' (Lowth.) Our Lord is the only person, recorded in Scripture, who used the words rendered "Verily, verily, I say unto you:" and the original is Amen, Amen. (Note, Matt. vi. 5, 6.)

V. 17—19. The apostles Peter and John, use the expressions, "new heavens and a new earth," for the heavenly state after the end of the world and the day of judgment; (Marg. Ref.) and St. Peter says, that "we "look for it according to his promise," which may refer to this very passage: yet the context seems to require us to interpret the words in this place of that state of the Church on earth, which shall most resemble the world of glory, in knowledge, holiness, and felicity, and which will terminate in it. By the new-creating power of God, the circumstances of the Church and the character of men, shall be so altered, that it will appear as a new world; so that the former confusions, iniquities, and miseries of the human race shall be no more remembered, or renewed. The servants of God are therefore commanded to rejoice in this new state of things, which he was about to create: for he would make Jerusalem, (the true Church,) and all her inhabitants joyful, and a joy to all around them; nay, he would rejoice in them, and put an end to their sorrows and complaints.

V. 20. The approaching happy condition of the Church is next described under a variety of images, many of which we have not before met with. Longevity is here promised, and premature death excluded from this state. From that time, or thenceforth, children shall not generally be cut off in infancy, nor even old men till they have filled the measure of their days. Insomuch, that he shall be thought to die in his youth, that lives to the age of a hundred years: whilst the sinner, who lives to a hundred years of age, shall at last die accursed; or, he that shall die at the age of a hundred years, shall be considered as dying in his youth, as a punishment for his sins. The event alone can certainly determine whether this is meant literally or figuratively: but it is evident, that the universal prevalence of real Christianity would so terminate wars, murders, contentions, idleness, intemperance, and licentiousness, as greatly to lengthen out the general term of man's life. Many diseases, which now destroy thousands and tens of thousands, in the prime of life, and communicate distempers to succeeding generations, would in that case scarcely be heard of any more: and thus the human constitution would soon be much mended, and children would generally come into the world more vigorous and healthy, than they can do while vice so greatly prevails. What God may further intend in this matter we cannot determine.

V. 21—23. Here the outward peace of the Church, and her freedom from persecutions, seem principally intended. Every one in those happy days shall be allowed to possess the fruit of his labours, and shall live long to enjoy it: for their days shall be as the days of a tree. An oak is supposed to be meant, which will sometimes endure a thousand years from the time that it is planted until that of its total decay: and thus the days of God's chosen shall be as those of the antediluvians. But may not this refer to the thousand years, during which Satan shall be bound up, and the prosperity of the Church continue? (Rev. xx. 1—7.) —Nor will children then be the trouble of their parents, heirs of trouble themselves, or a short lived race; but their blessings shall be entailed on their offspring also. (Marg. Ref.)—The converted Gentiles, as well as the Jews, will be owned as the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, "the blessed of the LORD," and with their posterity inherit the blessings promised to them and their seed.

V. 24, 25. The prayers of the people shall then be answered without delay, and in the most abundant manner: for whereas we now pray, that "the knowledge of God

"may fill the earth as the waters cover the sea," and ages pass on before our prayers are answered; their desires in this respect shall be granted before they speak; for then "the name of God will be hallowed, his kingdom come, "and his will done on earth," in great measure, "as it is in "heaven." The malignant dispositions of sinners of every description will then be most completely mortified, and they will all become harmless, amiable, and harmonious. The old serpent shall then be deprived of his prey, and have the ancient sentence fully executed upon him. (Notes, Gen. iii. 14, 15. Rev. xx. 1—3.) And thus the Church on earth shall be full of peace and happiness, like heaven.—(xi. 6—9.) None can doubt, but this yet remains to be accomplished.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The Lord may say of all who are numbered among his people on earth or in heaven, that "He was found of "them, who sought him not." When we were strangers and enemies, foolish and disobedient, serving divers lusts and pleasures, he prevented us by the call of his word, and the influences of his grace: and whenever, or in what manner soever, we were disposed to seek the Lord; he first suggested the thought and created the disposition, and having thus led us to seek and pray unto him, he further made himself and his ways known unto us. Often he meets with some thoughtless profligate, or prejudiced opposer, and as it were, says to him, 'Behold me, here I 'am, come to me; Look unto me, and be saved;' and a speedy change takes place; Saul is found amongst the Christians and apostles, and a spiritual worshipper appears in the Church of God: whilst others, brought up under the Gospel, to whom the Lord daily stretches forth his hands, proffering salvation to them, grow more and more rebellious, and follow their own perverse inclinations and evil courses, in defiance of him. Too often, likewise, he has cause to say of his professed worshippers, that they are "a people who provoke him continually to his face:" and that they manifest the same ungrateful spirit, and rebellious alienation from him, and the same perverse disposition to prefer their own inventions to his ordinances, truths, and precepts, as the Jewish nation did. Where the power of godliness is decayed, men grow proud of the worthless form; and the most offensive hypocrites are most prone to look upon the ignorant, the erroneous, the careless, the immoral, or profane, with disdain and loathing; nay, they contemn the humble and penitent, and say of those, in whom God delighteth, "Stand by thyself, I am holier "than thou." When knowledge, gifts, reputation, or religious performances foster this hateful propensity, they become most injurious to the possessor: and, however he may admire himself, or be admired by others, he is as odious and displeasing unto God, as a smoke in the nose; and nothing more kindles, or feeds the fire of his indignation, than such a disposition and conduct. Let us then watch and pray against them; remembering that every sin and the most secret thoughts of men's hearts are written before God, and will assuredly be brought to light, and recompensed upon every impenitent sinner: and when nations or churches have filled up their measure of iniquity, they will be punished with temporal judgments for their own sins, and those of their fathers which they have imitated. Amongst the various reasons which induce the Lord to spare ungodly men, one is, that "a blessing is in "them." Some one, or more, or many shall descend from them, to form a part of his chosen flock; and therefore he bears with them from year to year, that he may bring forth a seed out of them to inherit his holy mountain. For all things are for the sake of his chosen people: the kingdom of providence is administered, and the frame of nature is preserved, for the display of the glory of God in his church of redeemed sinners.

V. 11—25.

In every age and nation the Lord consigns to destruction those who forsake his service to follow their own lusts and devices; and especially such as persist in doing evil in contempt of the call of his Gospel. Sometimes he makes an evident discrimination on earth betwixt his servants and his enemies: but this will be uniformly visible hereafter; and whilst his servants will be satisfied with his love, filled with joy, and abound in his praise; his enemies shall endure the extremest miseries in the regions of despair, where are weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth. That the declarations of God's words to this effect will be exactly accomplished, we may be assured by the long continued contempt and miseries of the Jews: for the Lord hath indeed left their name to be a curse unto his chosen, having cut them off, and called his people by another name, as he declared that he would. But when they shall be restored to their privileges, the truth of God will be rendered still more conspicuous; that all the earth may bless themselves in him, render him worship, and swear unto him in truth and righteousness. Then the long continued troubles of the Church shall cease, and her prosperity will commence. But what a change will this be, when the earth shall be filled with spiritual religion, and exact righteousness! It may well be called new heavens and a new earth: for as we can scarcely frame an idea of so glorious a scene; so the inhabitants of the world in that blessed period will not be able to form an idea of the wretched and confused state of the earth, during the prevalence of vice and impiety. We shall not live to share this joy and gladness: but we may mix our lamentations over the scenes we witness, with rejoicings in the prospect of happier times; and, if believers,

THUS saith the LORD, [a] The heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool: [b] where is the house that ye build unto me? and where is the place of my rest?

2 For [c] all those things hath mine hand made, and all those things have been, saith the LORD: but [d] to this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and [e] trembleth at my word.

3 He that [f] killeth an ox, is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a * lamb, as if he [g] cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, [h] as if he offered swine's blood; he that †burneth incense, as if he blessed an idol. Yea, [i] they have chosen their own ways, and their soul delighteth in their abominations.

4 I also [k] will choose their ‡ delusions, and [l] will bring their fears upon them; because [m] when I called, none did answer; when I spake, they did not hear: but [m] they did evil before mine eyes, and chose that in which I delighted not.

we shall in heaven share the joy of them when they actually arrive: our troubles will soon be terminated by death, and our God will rejoice over us to do us good for ever. Even the natural evils of the world would be inconceivably diminished, if all men were true Christians; and their lives would be prolonged, and rendered more comfortable in every respect. Yet if we be prepared for heaven, and have finished our work on earth, we need not complain of dying too young; for all the ends of life will be answered, as much as if we had lived to be a hundred years old. But the sinner must be miserable, whether he live to be old and to treasure up wrath, or be cut off young and cast into destruction; and all his planting, building, and labouring must be left to others, whilst he is driven away in his wickedness. On the other hand, the believer may rejoice even in his temporal labours, that somebody will be benefitted by them, when he is removed to a better inheritance; where he shall long enjoy the gracious recompense of all his services, yea, even for ever and ever: and he may also hope that his children will be favoured after him, as the seed of the blessed of the Lord. Though our prayers are not now always answered immediately, yet they will be in due time; and the more instant and fervent we are in this respect, the fuller evidence we shall have, that the Lord regards the desires of our hearts, and sometimes grants them before we can express them in words, or whilst we are yet speaking: so that we are employed in praise when we meant to be pouring out our prayers. But let us especially pray to be changed from wolves and lions, into lambs and doves, and to be made harmless, gentle, and useful: then we may be assured, that "God will bruise "Satan under our feet shortly," and that we shall be admitted to his holy habitation, where none shall hurt, or destroy, but all shall be love and enjoyment for ever and ever.

NOTES.

CHAP. LXVI. V. 1, 2. The Jews, in our Saviour's time, were extremely attached to the temple and its external worship, which was one cause of their opposition to his spiritual kingdom and ordinances. Just before his coming they had, by king Herod's assistance, almost entirely rebuilt the temple with great magnificence, having been forty-six years employed about it. (Mark xiii. 1, 2. John ii. 20.) To this period the prophecy seems especially to relate: and the Lord addresses them as employed in this work, or proud of it, and reminds them, that he had heaven for his throne of glory, and the earth for his footstool, and wanted no house or resting place of their building. The typical intention and temporary use of the temple were nearly accomplished; the labour and confidence of the Jews were vain: and the whole of that dispensation waxed old, and was ready to vanish away. The heavens and the earth, which he made, had long continued, and would still remain; but the temple and its worship had been, and would soon be no more: for henceforth his temple on earth, to which he would have peculiar regard, would be the heart of the poor contrite penitent, who revered, and obeyed and trembled at his word; whereas they who adhered to the temple, were proud blind Pharisees and hypocrites, or others, who despised both his authority and his Gospel. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 3, 4. The Jews might have urged, that though God did not want the temple for his habitation, yet it was both honourable and necessary, as the place appointed for the offering of sacrifices: but he here teaches them, that this institution was about to be superseded, nay, to become a mark of obstinate rebellion. Some interpreters suppose that he approves the wickedness of those who brought their sacrifices to the temple, whilst they were living in the practice of murder, or the grossest crimes: but it is not probable that the Jews, during or after the days of Christ, actually offered a dog, or swine's blood, in sacrifice, or that the priests blessed or worshipped idols. Nor does the passage merely imply that their hypocrisy rendered their sacrifices abominable to God, though they were his own institutions: but the evident meaning is that the coming and sacrifice of Christ would virtually abrogate the ceremonial law, and render all its observances nugatory; and that the Jews, who persisted in them, not as indifferent things, but in contempt of Christ and his priesthood, sacrifice, and intercession, would be guilty of as gross an affront to God as if they had committed murder, or the most atrocious profanation or idolatry. For in so doing they would choose their own proud and rebellious ways, delight in their own abominations, and show their contempt of JEHOVAH's authority, and enmity to his holiness, as much as their fathers did, when they were mad upon their idols. He would therefore choose their delusions, as the means of bringing his judgments upon them: and as they rejected and crucified Christ, avowedly for fear of the Romans; he would bring their fears upon them, and the Romans should execute his vengeance on them in consequence of their unbelief and disobedience. (Note, lxv. 11, 12.)

V. 5, 6. The Jewish converts to Christianity seem to be here addressed. They trembled at God's word, and reverenced his authority: but, by embracing the Gospel, they were exposed to the extreme hatred of their countrymen, who excommunicated and persecuted them for the Lord's sake, and out of a pretended or a mistaken furious zeal for his glory; but he assured them that he would appear to their joy, and for the confusion of their persecutors, which was awfully accomplished in the siege and destruction of Jerusalem. (Marg. Ref.) The Jews indeed trusted in the external sanctity of the city and temple: yet within their walls, and even in the courts of the temple, would the Lord execute vengeance on them, as his enemies; and their outcries and lamentations would declare that he was rendering a recompense unto them, even for the abuse of those institutions on which they ignorantly and presumptuously depended for safety. 'The prophet seems to hear the 'noise of the ruin of the city and temple sounding in his 'ears.' 'The voice from the temple was verified in that 'voice, which Josephus tells us was heard in the temple, 'a little before the final destruction of it, saying, Let us 'depart hence.' (Lowth.)

V. 7—9. When the temple should be destroyed, and the ancient people of God cast off, it might be apprehended that he would no longer have a church, or at least that the number of his worshippers would be very small. In answer to this rising thought of his people, he here assures them, that the Church should at that time be vastly increased, by the accession of the converted Gentiles to the remnant of believing Jews. The ancient Church and nation of Israel were not produced in less than four hundred and thirty years from the calling of Abraham: but the holy nation now to be subject to his government should be rapidly formed. Zion, represented as a pregnant woman, would be delivered of a son, even before her travailing pains came upon her: nay, her children would increase so rapidly, that a nation would seem to be born at once: and they would so speedily arrive at maturity, that it would be as if the earth produced and ripened the harvest in one day. These events would indeed be unprecedented; but they would certainly take place: the almighty God would bring the affairs of his Church to such a crisis, that this deliverance and increase must be afforded her, or she must perish; and could any think that he who espoused Zion, and was the Father of all her children, would fail of giving her effectual assistance in this extremity?

V. 10—14. The Lord here calls on all, who love his Church and sympathize with her in her sorrows, to rejoice at the approach of her great prosperity. The consolations that would be prepared for all her children, in the promises and ordinances of the Gospel, must be applied for by earnest faith and prayer, as the infant desires the nutrimental milk, and draws it out from the mother's breast. Thus believers would be satisfied and sanctified by her spiritual provisions, as well as enriched and delighted by the abundance, or the splendour, of her glory. For in due time the Lord would bestow on her peace and prosperity in large measure, and with durable increase; and the most honourable and renowned of the nations would continue to flow in to her, like the perpetual stream of some large river. Nor would this be any diminution to the privileges of Zion's former children, but an increase of them; as they would be nourished and attended to with still greater care and tenderness; being peculiarly loved and cherished by the Gentile converts. Nay, the Lord himself would comfort them, 15 ¶ For, behold, [m] the LORD will come with fire, and [n] with his chariots like a whirlwind, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire.

16 For by fire, and [o] by his sword will the LORD plead with all flesh: and the slain of the LORD shall be many.

17 They that [p] sanctify themselves, and purify themselves in the gardens, * behind one tree in the midst, [q] eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the mouse, shall be consumed together, saith the LORD.

18 For [r] I know their works, and [s] their thoughts: it shall come, [t] that I will gather all nations and tongues; and they shall come, [u] and see my glory.

19 And [x] I will set a sign among them, and [y] I will send those that escape of them unto the nations, to [z] Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, that draw the bow, [a] to Tubal, and Javan, to [b] the isles afar off, [c] that have not heard my fame, neither have seen my glory; and they shall declare my glory among the Gentiles.

20 And they shall [d] bring all your brethren for [e] an offering unto the LORD, out of all nations, [f] upon horses, and in chariots, and in † litters, and upon mules, and upon swift beasts, to [g] my holy mountain Jerusalem, saith the LORD, as the children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessel into the house of the LORD.

21 And [h] I will also take of them for priests, and for Levites, saith the LORD.

22 For as [i] the new heavens, and the new earth, which I will make, shall remain before me, saith the LORD, [k] so shall your seed and your name remain.

23 And it shall come to pass, [l] that ‡ from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, [m] shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the LORD.

not only with the prudent affection of a father, but with tender blandishments and compassions resembling those of a fond mother. The prosperity of the Church would add to their consolations, and cause their souls to thrive more abundantly; whilst the power of God would thus be manifested in favour of his servants, and his indignation in the punishment of his adversaries. The sacred writer gradually, and almost insensibly, passes from the primitive times to those more glorious events, which he so frequently recurs to. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15—18. This seems a general prophetical declaration of the Lord's vengeance on all the enemies of his Church, through successive generations: especially the destruction of the unbelieving Jews, in the first ages of Christianity, and that of the Antichristian opposers of the Gospel in the latter days. God himself would come, with fiery indignation, and the instruments of his vengeance, to plead with all flesh, and make terrible slaughter among them. (Marg. Ref.) The persons intended were guilty of many idolatries and superstitions, the description of which seems to be taken from the abominations to which the Jews were addicted in the prophet's days. They sanctified themselves for the idolatrous sacrifices, which they offered in gardens, or groves, behind some one sacred tree in the midst, (or to Achad, an idol so called, and supposed to mean the sun:) and then feasted on unclean animals, as if in contempt and defiance of God. These their works and wicked thoughts, the Lord knew of long before, and would certainly punish: and he would show all nations his glory in the destruction of his enemies, and by the promulgation of his Gospel.

V. 19—23. When the standard of the Gospel was set up, the Jews who had been converted to Christ, and so escaped the general ruin of the nation, were sent to preach to the Gentiles: and in like manner, it is probable, that God will select some who have been rescued from the corruptions of the Antichristian church, to preach to the nations, far and near, where his fame and glory have never yet been heard and seen; even to isles as remote from us and as little known to us, as this our island was to the inhabitants of the East in the days of Isaiah. The persons thus converted are immediately considered as brethren: and they would be brought by every method of conveyance then in use, to Jerusalem, as a sacred oblation to the Lord. This signifies the abundance of instruments and means afforded for the conversion of sinners, and their admission into the Church; and for their encouragement, edification, and devotedness to God, until they are brought to heaven. Ministers were soon raised up from among the Gentiles in the apostles' days, who ministered before God in holy things, (as the priests and Levites used to do,) according to the nature of their dispensation: and ministers will doubtless be hereafter raised up among the inhabitants of those nations, which are now sunk in the deepest ignorance and barbarity. For as God intended his new creation to endure before him for ever; so should the seed and name of the Church under the Christian dispensation. They too would have their solemnities, sabbaths, sacraments and ordinances, in which they would meet before the Lord: and all flesh, or all nations, would thus come to worship before him.—'Whereas before there were appointed seasons to sacri-'fice; in this there shall be one continued sabbath.'

V. 24. The inhabitants of the holy city are here represented as going out, to look upon the dead bodies of those whom the Lord had slain for opposing his cause; which are represented as being either eaten by worms, or burnt in the fire. But their worm would never die, nor their fire be quenched: for whatever external events may be alluded to or predicted, the worm and the fire represent the place and nature of the punishment of sinners in another world. The fire which is kindled by the wrath of God, shall not be quenched or cease to torment for ever: the worm of keen self-reflection, and the anguish of an accusing conscience, will endure for ever: because the existence and consciousness of the condemned will be everlasting. (Notes, Mark ix. 33—50.) Some interpret the carcasses cast out of Jerusalem, to signify the ungodly who are excluded from the Church, and remain under the wrath of God, and the power of their own vile lusts; and being thus abhorred on earth, will be miserable and abominable for ever in hell. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—14.

No externals, however splendid or costly, can please God, without a humble and upright heart. He wants not, and is not profited by any of our services: and when we become proud of them or trust in them, he abhors our attendance even on his own appointments. As he dwelleth in Christ, our Temple; so, for his sake, he hath respect to every one that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at his word: for such persons value his salvation, and learn to love him and keep his commandments. But whatever men substitute in the place of the priesthood, atonement, and intercession of Christ, will be found most hateful to God: and he will more resent this affront to his wisdom, grace, and truth, than any profaneness or immorality whatsoever. Yet, alas, how many in this most important concern, choose their own ways, and are delighted with their own abominations! but we should be afraid of every deviation from scriptural truth, lest God should give us over to our own delusions. They who so fear the reproach, or opposition of men, as to refuse the call and reject the salvation of God, will have their fears brought upon them in everlasting shame and contempt. Seeing that many have thought they did God service, when they were hating and casting out his children, we should take care that our confidence and conscientiousness be scriptural. It will not avail a man to have said "Let God be glorified," when in proud self-confidence and obstinate rage, he persecuted his people, and refused to ask counsel of his word and Spirit. But they who tremble at the word of God, need not be alarmed even at the hatred of their professed brethren, or staggered by their "great swelling words of "vanity;" as if they alone were the only true Church, and all who differed from them were heretics and schismatics. Such boasts and censures are alike unwarranted; God will appear to the joy of the humble believer, and to the confusion of hypocrites and persecutors; their destruction will come upon them in those very places, from those very persons, or by those very means, in which they presumptuously confided for safety; and they shall be accounted the enemies of God with a peculiar emphasis. When the Lord lessens the numbers of his visible Church by cutting off false professors, we need not fear but he will supply their places by more valuable persons. He can add converts in multitudes, as though a nation were born in a day. In the general course of Providence, we must expect to labour, wait, and pray for a considerable time, before we see the success of our work: and ministers must even travail in birth, by their anxious desires and fervent wrestlings, before children are brought forth unto God. They must also wait, as the husbandman, for the precious fruits of the earth; and at last be thankful even for a few seals to their ministry. But when the Lord is pleased to interpose in an extraordinary manner, the work will be done easily, speedily, and beyond expectation. The success, that would richly have repayed the labours of many years, shall crown one sermon; and believers shall grow as rapidly in grace, as converts are made to the Lord. Thus in the days of the apostles, "As soon as Zion travailed she brought "forth her children, and a nation seemed to be born in a "day." And the Lord is able so to influence the hearts of men, that whole kingdoms shall at once, without labour or difficulty, welcome, profess, and adorn the Gospel. The time of this deliverance of Zion approacheth; and he that bringeth to the birth, will give strength to bring forth. Let us then say, in admiring faith, "Who hath "heard, or seen such things?" And not fail to show our sympathy with the Church in her sorrows, by pleading continually for her joyful deliverance. Then shall we assuredly rejoice in her joy, and partake of her consolations. And even now, if we diligently attend on the ordinances of God, and desire and seek for "the sincere milk of the "word, that we may grow thereby," we shall "suck, and "be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations;" especially if we carefully avoid whatever may prevent our furtherance and joy of faith. Let us then renounce the vain pleasures of the world and of sin, that we may experience these pure and satisfying joys; and we shall soon be delighted with all the splendour and glory of the Church triumphant. In other possessions, as the number of proprietors increase, the value to each is diminished; but the privileges and felicity of all Christians is enhanced, by every accession of converts to Christ. There is also abundant provision made for the tending and nourishing up of the weakest of Zion's children, who shall suck the breasts of her consolations, be carried on her sides, or dandled on her knees: yea, the Lord himself will comfort them through all their tribulations, in such tender love as no human affection can possibly equal. But nothing tends more to the true Christian's comfort, than the peace and prosperity of the Church. When the honourable of the earth resort to her, believers, as her dutiful sons, rejoice heartily, and flourish like herbs in well watered gardens.

V. 15—24.

Whenever the Lord powerfully appears for his Church; he displays his indignation against his adversaries. Thus the increase of believers in the primitive times was attended by tremendous judgments on the Jews: thus the future success of the Gospel will be introduced by similar judgments on all opposers: and thus the final salvation of the righteous will be connected with vengeance on all the workers of iniquity. Then by the fire and sword of his indignation will he plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many: sinners of every description shall be consumed together; for he knoweth their works and their thoughts; and he will gather all nations and tongues to see his glory. In the mean time, he hath set his Gospel as a sign unto us; and even in these distant isles he sends us his message of love by those whom "Jesus hath delivered "from the wrath to come." We have heard his name and the report of his salvation: may he open our eyes to see his glory, that we may forward the promulgation of his Gospel, and the declaration of that glory to the nations, that have never yet seen or heard of it. May the Lord send forth multitudes of able faithful ministers into all lands, who by every means and in every way, may gather in his elect from the four quarters of the globe; that all its inhabitants may become members of his Church on earth, and inherit his holy mountain, to the praise of the glory of his grace: that even from among the benighted Indians and Africans, priests and Levites may be raised up to minister before him; and thus to diffuse his salvation further and wider, till the earth be filled with the knowledge of his glory, as the waters cover the sea. The Lord will surely maintain and prosper his cause. The heavens and earth that now exist, are indeed reserved unto fire, to the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men: but his new heaven and earth shall endure for ever; and so shall the name and seed of his believing people. Let us then hearken to his voice, attend on his ordinances, hallow his sabbaths, and keep his word. For all his enemies, whether they experience or escape his temporal judgments, shall perish: and we shall see all the ungodly go away into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels. "Then shall "ye return, and discern between the righteous and the "wicked, between him that serveth God and him that "serveth him not."—If then "thy right hand, foot, or "eye offend thee, cut it off, or pluck it out; for it is "better to enter into life with one eye, or hand, or foot; "than having two, to be cast into hell fire, where their "worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched;" and "they shall be an abhorring to all flesh."

THE BOOK

OF THE

PROPHET JEREMIAH.

Jeremiah (whose name signifies "the exaltation of the Lord,") entered upon the prophetical office about seventy years after the death of Isaiah; during which time the reigns of Manasseh and Amon had intervened, and the former years of Josiah. The nation of the Jews was therefore at that time almost wholly given up to idolatry and wickedness. A short revival indeed soon took place: but the people were in general dissemblers, speedily relapsed into idolatry, and became ripe for divine judgments. Jeremiah prophesied for forty years preceding the Babylonish captivity; and this book consists chiefly of abstracts of the several messages with which he was sent from God to the people: these are remarkable for being replete with plain and faithful reproofs, tender and affectionate expostulations, and anful denunciations of impending judgments. They are occasionally interspersed with narratives of the usage that the prophet met with, and with historical records of national affairs. No exact order is observed in the arrangement of the different prophecies; and the labours of learned men, in classing them, according to the time when delivered, are not satisfactory: but many of them are dated. Jeremiah was a man of a very tender spirit, and he endured many sorrows; but he seems to have been most affected by the miseries of his people, which he both predicted and witnessed. Having seen the utter desolation of Jerusalem and Judah, he was carried into Egypt by the remnant of the Jews, who rebelliously fled thither; and there he continued to prophesy, till they were at length so enraged by his reproofs, that they stoned him to death, as it is credibly attested by several ancient writers. A large proportion of Jeremiah's predictions were accomplished during his life-time, or soon after his death. Such were all those that related to the desolations of Jerusalem and Judah, and the adjacent countries, by the Chaldeans; and the return of the Jews from Babylon at the end of seventy years. These, in the way of argument and evidence, were most conclusive to his contemporaries and the immediately succeeding generations: especially as the want of historical records renders us unable, in many cases, to explain the prophecies, except from the sacred narrative. But several of this prophet's predictions relate to more remote ages, and some have not yet been fulfilled. When proud Babylon was at the height of her prosperity, he foretold, not only that the Medes and Persians should prevail against her, but also that she should sink and rise no more, (li. 63, 64.) which has received a most remarkable accomplishment. He predicted also the abolition of the ritual law, and the union of Israel and Judah in one faith, and the conversion of all nations; (Notes, iii. 15. &c. xxxi. 31, &c.;) the dispersion of the Jews, and their preservation as a distinct people in their dispersions, which has been fulfilled to this day; (Notes, xxx. 11. xlvi. 28:) the calling of the Gentiles; (iv. 3) the destruction of idolatry; (Note, x. 11:) and the person and kingdom of Christ, with the introduction of a new dispensation, and vast prosperity to the cause of religion; with clear declarations concerning the conversion of the Jews to Christ, and their restoration to their own land. (Notes, xxiii. xxxiii.) The comment will show, that this statement is well founded: yet nothing could appear more improbable, when Jeremiah wrote, than many of the events which he predicted; and it is undeniable that his prophecies have been most wonderfully accomplished. It appears that his reputation as a prophet was very high among the Jews, in the time of our Saviour: for when the people were divided in opinion who Jesus was, some supposed him to be Elijah, and others Jeremiah. His prophecies are repeatedly quoted in the New Testament, as the oracles of God; and thus receive the most unreserved sanction of the apostles and evangelists. (Compare xxxi. 15. Matt. ii. 17, 18.—vi. 16. Matt. xi. 29.—ix. 23, 24, 1 Cor. i. 29—31.—xxxi. 31—34. Heb. viii. 8—12. x. 15—17.) The last references are peculiarly important; for in one of them, God himself is mentioned as speaking the words referred to; and in the other it is said, "whereof the Holy Ghost is a witness to us," &c. This is decisive, as to the judgment of the inspired apostles, respecting the book on which we now enter; and it is peculiarly suited to put us upon our guard against those professed friends of the scripture, who speak of these books, as venerable, authentic, or genuine remains of antiquity, of great value and high authority; but hesitate to vindicate them as divinely inspired. A great part of this book is supposed to be poetry: and though Jeremiah is thought inferior to Isaiah in sublimity; (which may perhaps be owing to the different circumstances in which they lived, and the different subjects on which they treated:) yet it must be allowed, that he is admirably pathetical, his descriptions of approaching judgments are peculiarly vivid; and his eloquence is very vigorous and impressive, when inveighing against the shameless audacity of the people in rebellion against God. It is generally allowed that the last chapter was added after Jeremiah's death: perhaps by Ezra, who probably arranged his prophecies in their present order.

NOTES.

CHAP. I. V. 1—3. Jeremiah, being of the family of Aaron, would have been an ordinary teacher of the people, if he had not been called to this extraordinary office; and he united in himself the priestly and prophetical character, in which, as in many other respects, he was a type of Christ. Some think he was the son of Hilkiah the high priest, who found the book of the law in the temple, (2 Kings xxii. 8:) but as no intimation is given of this in the subsequent history, the opinion is not very probable. Anathoth was about three miles distant from Jerusalem. Jeremiah was appointed to prophecy just after Josiah had effectually begun his reformation: and great things might have been expected from the united efforts of such a king and such a prophet, both young, and likely to continue long to be useful to their nation: yet their zealous labours aggravated the guilt, and thus accelerated the ruin, of their incorrigible fellow-citizens. Jeremiah prophesied forty years before the expulsion of the Jews from the promised land, as Moses had prophesied forty years previous to their entrance into it; but with a very different effect.

V. 4. 'This seems to have been a visible appearance 'of the divine majesty,—by the Son of God,—the second 'Person in the blessed Trinity.' (Lowth.) (Note, 9, 10.)

V. 5. (Marg. Ref.) The Lord foreknew Jeremiah, before he was formed in the womb; and gave him his being, on purpose to make him a prophet to the Jews and other nations: he separated him, in his intention for this work before his birth, and perhaps made him partaker of the regeneration of the Holy Spirit, even in his mother's womb. And he let him know this his appointment, that he might prepare for the work assigned him, and apply himself to it. 'This favour is expressed by knowing him, 'or taking special notice of him: as if a prince should 'single one particular person out of a multitude, and call 'him by name, and appoint him to some honourable 'office or trust. So God expresses the peculiar favour he 'had to Moses, by saying, "I know thee by name." (Lowth.) 'Jeremiah did not only prophesy concerning 'the Jews, but also the Egyptians, Babylonians, Moabites, 'and other nations.' (xxv. xlvi—li.)

6 Then said I, [o] Ah, Lord GOD! behold, [p] I cannot speak; [q] for I am a child.

7 But the LORD said unto me, Say not, I am a child: [r] for thou shalt go to all that I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command thee thou shalt speak.

8 Be [s] not afraid of their faces: [t] for I am with thee to deliver thee, saith the LORD.

9 Then the LORD put forth his hand, [u] and touched my mouth; and the LORD said unto me, [x] Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth.

10 See, [y] I have this day set thee over the nations, and over the kingdoms, [z] to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down, [a] to build, and to plant.

11 ¶ Moreover, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Jeremiah, [b] what seest thou? And I said, I see [c] a rod of an almond-tree.

12 Then said the LORD unto me, [d] Thou hast well seen: for [e] I will hasten my word to perform it.

13 And the word of the LORD came unto me [f] the second time, saying, What seest thou? And I said, [g] I see a seething pot; and the face thereof is * toward the north.

14 Then the LORD said unto me, [h] Out of the north an evil shall † break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land.

V. 6—8. The prophet would have declined, at least for the present, the service to which he was called. He was so young and inexperienced, that he did not think himself competent to so arduous and important an office; and he thought himself defective in the capacity of speaking with fluency and pertinency, or with that boldness and presence of mind which were requisite. (Marg. Ref.) This objection, though it arose from humility and a proper sense of the greatness of the work, was alloyed with a mixture of unbelief, and a timid reluctancy to the perils and hardships, to which he might be exposed. The Lord therefore over-ruled his objection, and ordered him not to say that he was a child; for he would embolden and strengthen him to address all to whom he sent him, and give him utterance to deliver all that he commanded him: he ought therefore to dismiss his fears, and rest assured that the Lord would be with him to defend and deliver him. (Matt. xxviii. 20.)—The eighth verse is future, as well as the others; and may more literally be rendered, "Thou "shalt not fear their faces," &c.: as a promise and not as a command.—The word translated child, is used with great latitude in Scripture; and frequently signifies one who has arrived at full maturity: so that we cannot from it determine any thing concerning the age of Jeremiah, when he entered on his prophetical office.—'To reprove the faults 'of all persons, the great men of the world, as well as 'those of lower degree, with that plainness and impartiali 'ty which the prophets used, requires a more than ordi- 'nary degree of courage.' (Lowth.)

V. 9, 10. This seems to have been an appearance of the personal Word of the Lord, in human form, anticipating his incarnation. (Note, 4.) He therefore put forth his hand, and by touching Jeremiah's mouth, signified that he would "give him a mouth and wisdom, which all his "adversaries should not be able to gainsay or resist." (Luke xxi. 15.) Thus he gave him commission and authority over the nations, not to rule or make war against them, but to denounce the judgments of God upon them; and these would be so certainly executed, according to his word, that he might be said to root them out and throw them down, &c. He was also to declare the Lord's mercies and salvation to his people, which would be effectual to build and to plant them. It may also mean, that the tendency of the prophet's ministry would be to repress the idolatry and wickedness of the nations, and to promote the knowledge of God and true religion among them: and the desolations to be wrought in some nations, which had most obstinately opposed the cause of God, would make way for the planting and building of others in their places, that would be more favourable to it. (Marg. Ref.) 'The 'prophets are said to do things, when they declare God's 'purpose of doing them. Thus Ezekiel was sent to 'destroy the city; that is, to prophesy concerning its 'destruction. And Isaiah is commanded to "make the "heart of the Jews fat," that is, to foretel their obduration 'and incredulity.' (Lowth.) It may, however, also be added, that God foresaw that the Jews and others would aggravate their past guilt, and even bring down on themselves both spiritual and temporal judgments, by hardening their hearts against the warnings and exhortations of his prophets. And thus the very message which, if properly received, would have been the means of their preservation, tended to hasten and enhance their punishments.

V. 11, 12. 'Not only the nature of the almond-tree, 'but the very sound' (or meaning) 'of the Hebrew word, '—denotes God's hastening to fulfil the prophecies which 'Jeremiah uttered.' (Lowth.) This vision of a rod of the almond-tree, which is more forward in the spring than any other tree, represented the speedy approach of the judgments predicted against the Jews and other nations; and it was an apt emblem of the prophet's mission, who lived to witness the accomplishment of more of his own predictions, than any other prophet did.

V. 13, 14. By another emblem the Lord showed Jeremiah what was to be the grand subject of his ministry, namely, the destruction of his people by the king of Babylon, whose dominions lay north of Judea. Jerusalem was represented to him, by a pot, or caldron, boiling over 15 For, lo, [i] I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the LORD; and they shall come, and [k] they shall set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem, and against all the walls thereof round about, and against all the cities of Judah.

16 And [l] I will utter my judgments against them, touching all their wickedness, [m] who have forsaken me, [n] and have burned incense unto other gods, and [o] worshipped the works of their own hands.

17 Thou therefore [p] gird up thy loins, and arise, [q] and speak unto them all that I command thee; [r] be not dismayed at their faces, [s] lest I * confound thee before them.

18 For, behold, [t] I have made thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls against the whole land, [u] against the kings of Judah, against the princes thereof, against the priests thereof, and against the people of the land.

19 And [x] they shall fight against thee; but they shall not prevail against thee; [y] for I am with thee, saith the LORD, to deliver thee.

a large fire: for the city was all in commotion, and about to be emptied by that fiery indignation which distressed it. The face of this seething pot was towards the north: the place under the caldron, which was opened to receive the fuel, by which the fire was kept up, faced the north; by which the Lord instructed the prophet that out of the north an evil should break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 15. Not only would the king of Babylon invade Judea and encamp against Jerusalem; but with him all those kings and nations, who were his allies or vassals, and who chiefly inhabited countries still more to the north than Chaldea.

V. 16. Jeremiah would especially be employed, in solemnly denouncing that sentence against the Jews for their idolatries, which the northern nations would speedily execute.

V. 17—19. 'God commands the prophet instantly to 'undertake the office he designed him for, and to discharge 'it with courage and presence of mind.' (Marg. Ref.)—'The Hebrew word is the same in both parts of the sen-'tence—"Be not thou confounded at their faces, lest I "confound thee before them." 'They shall no more be 'able to prevail against thee, than they could against an 'impregnable wall or fortress.' (Lowth.) The Lord thus called on his servant to expect the most violent opposition from all the great persons in the land; that he might understand the nature of the service, and be prepared accordingly: but such express promises of protection, support, and deliverance were added, as were fully sufficient for his encouragement. He seems, however, afterwards on some occasions, to have greatly lost sight both of the warnings and the promises. (Marg. Ref.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—10.

The Lord raises up and qualifies proper instruments for his work, in every age and circumstance of his Church: and when their labours fail to reform degenerate nations, they prove useful to some individuals, and leave others without excuse. He, who hath formed us in the womb, knew before-hand for what services or purposes he intended us: and he will qualify us for all that he hath for us to do or suffer, in this world, and carry us through it. But except he sanctify us by his new-creating Spirit, we shall neither be fit for his holy service on earth, nor his holy happiness in heaven. This is a most invaluable mercy, whenever it is vouchsafed: but the earlier in life, the happier for us and for others: and as the Lord sometimes sanctifies even infants, parents may be encouraged to pray for this blessing on their offspring, even from their conception in the womb. He who gives grace, can alone efficaciously ordain men to be his ministers. In general, young persons are not so proper for the discharge of this sacred office, in important stations and difficult times, as their seniors: and a modest diffidence arising from conscious unworthiness and inability, is a more favourable token, than self-confidence and a hasty eagerness to be employed. Yet the Lord may please to call one who is a child in years and experience, and apparently of inferior endowments: in this case he will surely make it evident that it is his call; he will overrule all objections and remove all impediments; he will encourage his servant against self-diffidence and fear of man, and bear him out in all to which he commissions him; "he will give him a mouth and wisdom, "which all his adversaries shall not be able to gainsay or "resist;" and will be with him in every work, in which he engages according to the instruction given him. Whatever the wise men and politicians of the world may profess, the safety of kingdoms is decided according to the purpose and word of God; and greatly depends on the reception that is given to his faithful ministers. When their labours are unsuccessful, and their prayers return into their own bosom; and when they are persecuted, injured, and driven away, nations ripen apace for judgments to root up and destroy them. But when they are protected and prospered, when their prayers are answered, and the number of true believers is greatly increased, there will be more and more, by their prayers, examples, and exertions, to check the progress of impiety and iniquity: and thus they are useful to build, and to plant, and to promote or to prolong, the external prosperity of the community as well as the salvation of souls.

others, we must observe attentively his word and works, and study his providence as well as his precepts; this will bring us acquainted with "the signs of the times," and direct our labours and prayers: and though our services are all imperfect and defiled; yet God will graciously show his approbation of all that we do well, according to our measure: and we should thus candidly accept of the well-meant services of each other. The destruction of the wicked, and the salvation of the righteous, are ripening apace; in both respects the Lord will hasten his word to perform it. This ministers must boldly declare, according to all that God commands them: they should therefore gird up their loins, and without delay address themselves to their work: they should expect enmity and opposition from many whose sins they reprove and whose doom they denounce: but they need not be dismayed at their stout, frowning, or menacing countenances; and they must not yield to unbelieving fears of man, lest the Lord should put them to shame before their enemies, and employ others to carry his messages. He will protect such, as simply follow and trust in him, against every assault of the wicked, as far as is good for them: he can make the feeblest and most timid, firm and immoveable as an iron pillar, and secure as a city defended by brazen walls, though whole nations should combine against them; and we should pray for fortitude and constancy in every temptation, and that they may be connected with prudence, meekness, humility, love, and a willingness to recede from every personal interest or inclination, whilst nothing can move us from our place and duty. If men do not prevail against us to render us unfaithful, negligent, or angry; they cannot greatly hurt us, however they may fight against us. But as there is no respect of persons with God; and kings, princes, and even priests, often need reproof and admonition, as much, or more than others: so they who are called to this perilous service will need and may expect peculiar supports, encouragement and protection; that "as their day is, so "their strength may be."

NOTES.

CHAP. II. V. 2, 3. Jeremiah, now about to open his ministry, was ordered to "cry in the ears of Jeru-"salem;" to proclaim his message in the most public places of the city; and to assure the inhabitants, that the Lord remembered the nation of Israel and those events which had taken place from the calling of Abraham, to the departure of his posterity out of Egypt, which might be called the youth of the nation; and the solemn transactions that had taken place at mount Sinai, which were as their espousals to God. The kindness of Israel's youth, and the love of their espousals, may mean either God's kindness to Israel, or Israel's professed love and zeal for him and his worship. They readily followed him out of Egypt, and on the banks of the Red Sea they sang his praises: they cheerfully and unreservedly acceded to the covenant at Sinai: and though they were guilty of many rebellions and provocations, yet they did not utterly renounce his worship and tenaciously set up open idolatry, as they did in after ages. So that in some sense Israel might then be called holiness to the Lord, his worshippers and the first-fruits of that harvest of believers, which he intended afterwards to reap from among men: and, considering the nation as immediately dedicated to him, he was offended with all those who attempted to injure them, and punished them for presuming to devour his portion. The last clause should be rendered, "did offend, evil did come upon them;" referring to judgments executed on Egypt, Amalek, and other nations, who opposed or assaulted Israel.

V. 4. The prophet's ministry was generally confined to Judah; and most of the ten tribes were carried captive and dispersed in foreign countries: yet in this, and many other places, he addresses all the descendants of Jacob. For in various ways, in that or future ages, numbers of the favoured nation would read, and might profit by, his instructions. (Marg. Ref.) apostatized: and they could have no excuse for this conduct, unless he had given them cause for it. Could they then bring any charge against him? Had their fathers ever found him unfaithful to his engagements, or oppressive in his government? Had he exacted unreasonable services, or inflicted immoderate punishments? Could they find fault with his precepts, ordinances, or providential dispensations? If they could not, why had they gone far from him, to follow vain and worthless idols, and become as vain and worthless as they?

V. 6. Shadow, &c. A solitary waste, such as continually reminded the people of death or threatened them with it; through this hitherto untrodden desert the Lord had safely led Israel. 'God's sustaining such a vast multitude 'in a barren desert was an amazing instance of his almighty 'power, and his goodness and care over his people.' (Lowth.)

V. 7. 'The Hebrew reads "into the land of Carmel," 'which was so plentiful a part of Judea, that the word 'came to signify a fruitful place in general.' (Lowth.)

V. 8, 9. 'The priests, whose office it was to instruct 'others in their duty, were ignorant or regardless of it 'themselves: and this was the principal cause of that de-'generacy of manners which prevailed among the people.' (Lowth.) The Scribes, who pretended to expound the Scriptures, did not understand them. The pastors, or rulers, civil and ecclesiastical, led the people into rebellion by example and influence: and even the prophets or extraordinary teachers, who professed to be divinely inspired, taught the people to commit idolatry. This concurrence of all orders in wickedness provoked God to plead with or punish the nation, and their remote posterity, who would be induced, in the natural course of things, to imbibe the corrupt principles and copy the bad examples of their progenitors. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 10—12. The Greeks, Romans, Arabians, and other inhabitants of the eastern or western world, adhered tenaciously to the gods and religion of their fathers; and though their idols were helpless and worthless, they would not change them: yet Israel, whose peculiar glory and happiness it was to worship the Creator of heaven and earth, were always ready to change their God and religion, for dumb idols and abominable superstitions, that tended to their disgrace and ruin! Well might the heavens be astonished at this senseless and hateful ingratitude, and appear as in a horrible consternation, and withdraw their light, in token of their grief and abhorrence of such enormous guilt. (Matt. xxvii. 45.) 'Such rhetorical apos-'trophes import the unusualness, and likewise the indig-'nity, of the things spoken of; implying them to be such, 'that if men take no notice of them, the elements them-'selves will testify against them.' (Lowth.)

V. 13. Every expression in this verse tends to aggravate the folly and guilt of Israel. They were the people of JEHOVAH, to whom his special favours had been shown, to whom his laws and oracles had been given, among whom his wonderful works had been wrought, and to whom his manifested presence was vouchsafed! Even this people had forsaken their God, who is indeed the fountain of living waters, the sum of all excellency and the source of all felicity; who communicates from his infinite fulness life and blessedness to his creatures: even to sinners who come to him in his appointed way; affording them freely whatever is necessary for acceptance, sanctification, and eternal salvation, and every thing conducive to their present comfort and security. To this Fountain of living waters Israel had free and unrestricted access, by means of their ordinances and the promises made to them of a Saviour that was to come; from this Fountain they might draw the waters of life by faith and prayer, whenever they would; they had always found it full and overflowing; and yet they had been so foolish and ungrateful as to forsake it! Nay, as if this evil had not been sufficient, they had committed another also: they could not be satisfied without an object of worship, though they renounced JEHOVAH; and therefore they set themselves to form gods and a religion for themselves: and thus with much labour they hewed out cisterns, which they preferred to the Fountain of living waters; though at best they could hold but little, and would soon be emptied, and the water in them must needs be turbid; and therefore they multiplied them to supply, if possible, this defect. But indeed their cisterns, when completed, were broken and could hold no water: their idols could do them no good, either in respect of their temporal or eternal concerns.

V. 14—19. The prophet here alludes to the case of the ten tribes. Was Israel born a slave in the family of some idolater? if not, why was he spoiled by them, and reduced to the basest bondage? The Assyrian princes, like young lions, had roared and prevailed against him, and desolated his land: and the inhabitants of Noph and Tahapanes, cities of Egypt, had destroyed his glory and strength. This may also be a prophetic intimation of the death of Josiah, when engaged against Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, and of the dethroning and captivity of Jehoahaz by the same prince. But the Israelites brought all these calamities upon themselves by apostatizing from God, and departing from the way in which he led them. And what business had they in Egypt, or in Assyria? Did they still prefer the waters of Sihor, (that is, the Nile,) or those of Euphrates, to the Fountain of living waters? Could such carnal confidences and idolatrous connexions tend more to their good, than a simple dependence on God and devotedness to him? They would therefore find these their revolts from him to be the sources of misery: for by giving these strangers admission among them, they brought themselves into a dependence on them, which ended in their ruin; and they were thus taught, that to sin against God was a bitter, as well as an evil thing, and that he was more to be feared than their strongest enemies.

V. 20, 21. In old times God brake the Egyptian yoke from off his people, and they promised to renounce idolatry and adhere to his worship: but they soon broke this solemn covenant, which was as the marriage compact; and they were guilty of spiritual adultery with every abominable idol, in the high places and groves. Yet in the choice of Abraham and the patriarchs of their nation, he had planted them a noble vine, wholly a right seed, as good a stock as could be procured of the human species: and under Joshua, he had planted them in the land, very much purified from idolatry, and an excellent race of men: yet, notwithstanding all their advantages, they were most inexcusably degenerated, and were become like the wild vine, that bears poisonous berries instead of grapes.

V. 22—24. The Jews could not conceal or excuse their guilt by any palliations or evasions: the labours of their reforming princes and prophets could not purge away their deep stains; they were so marked before God, that no means could be devised of washing them out. (Note, Prov. xxv. 20.) 'Though thou use all the purifications 'and ceremonies of the law, thou canst not escape punish-'ment; except thou turn to me by faith and repentance.' And yet they presumptuously pleaded, that they were not polluted, and had not gone after idols! For a short space they sometimes were restrained by their pious kings from the open practice of gross idolatry; but their hearts were bent upon it, and they speedily rushed into it again. 'The 'Jews, it seems, had found out distinctions, whereby to re-'concile the worship of the true God with those religious 'rites, which they paid to the idols of the heathen, called 'here Baalim. These, they pretended, were only inferior 'demons or spirits, or the souls of men departed: and 'might be worshipped in subordination to the supreme 'God. The word Baalim answers to the lords many, 'whom St. Paul mentions as the inferior deities of the 'heathen.' (Lowth.) This, and nothing better, may the papists urge in excuse of their manifest idolatry in worshipping saints and angels. The valley, (perhaps that of the son of Hinnom, where the Jews caused their children to pass through the fire,) was still marked with their footsteps and the vestiges of their idolatry; and when freed from restraint, they were as eager to return to their former practices, as the swift dromedary to traverse the plain: and as ready to multiply their idolatries, as she is to run to and fro in every direction. Nay, they were like the wild ass, when she snuffs up the wind in her eager desire to find out the male, and cannot be restrained from her pursuit. In that case, they who sought her would not weary themselves, but would wait till she was heavy with young, and then they would find her. Thus the Jews were greedily determined upon their idolatries, and often for the sake of those licentious practices with which they were attended: and nothing could restrain them, till they experienced the fatal effects of their conduct in the divine judgments executed upon them.

V. 25. 'Do not wear out thy shoes or sandals, and 'expose thyself to thirst and weariness, in undertaking 'long journeys, to make new alliances with idolaters.' (Lowth.) But they said, "There is no hope." The case is desperate, meaning, either that there was no hope of safety, except in heathen alliances or in idolatry; or no hope of mercy from God and deliverance from distress; or no hope of getting the better of their headstrong inclinations. And therefore, as they had loved strangers and strange gods, they were determined to go after them, and desperately to venture all consequences. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 26—30. The whole house of Israel, especially the rulers and teachers of every description, shunned detection like a thief; and yet they would certainly be detected and put to shame; for the Lord would prove against them, that they had ascribed divine honours to senseless idols, and worshipped them as the authors of their existence and of all their comforts. But though they thus turned their backs on JEHOVAH; yet, in their approaching troubles, they would call upon him to save them: and then he would send them to their idols to seek deliverance; but they would not obtain any help from them, though they were as numerous as their cities. 'Every city had its peculiar deity, after 'the manner of the heathen.' (Lowth.) And why should they attempt to plead their cause against God, or to expect the performance of his promises to the nation; when they had forfeited them by their sins; and when they were all involved in this national transgression, which violated their covenant? He had indeed had long patience with them; he had corrected them in his providence, and warned them by his prophets: but they had not derived benefit by his corrections; and by murdering his prophets, as a fierce lion devours the prey, they had filled up the measure of their iniquities. (Marg. Ref.)

V. 31, 32. If the Jews would not diligently attend to the word of God, they must prepare to see it, as accomplished before their eyes, even in that very generation. Could they say that the Lord had been to them as a wilderness, or a land of darkness and distress? On the contrary it was plain, that they had always prosperity and abundance of comforts, when they adhered to his service. Why then should they desire to renounce his authority and set up for their own masters, and affect independence? Why should they determine to come no more to him, from whom they had received so many pledges of love and such valuable blessings? Even the virgin was used to set far more store by her ornaments, or the bride by her nuptial garments, than Israel did by his relation to God, and all the honour, privilege, and happiness, connected with it! Nay, they had forgotten him days without number!

33 Why [r] trimmest thou thy way to seek love? therefore hast thou also [s] taught the wicked ones thy ways.

34 Also [t] in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents: [u] I have not found it by * secret search, but upon all these.

35 Yet thou sayest, [x] Because I am innocent, surely his anger shall turn from me: behold, [y] I will plead with thee, because thou sayest, I have not sinned.

36 Why [z] gaddest thou about so much to change thy way? [a] thou also shalt be ashamed of Egypt, [b] as thou wast ashamed of Assyria.

37 Yea, thou shalt go forth from him, and [c] thine hands upon thine head: [d] for the LORD hath rejected thy confidences, and thou shalt not prosper in them.

V. 33—37. The Lord here inquired of the people, why they imitated the harlots, who used every artifice to allure, and turned every way to meet, the companions of their shameful amours; for thus the Jews assiduously employed themselves in devising and embracing new idolatries. They not only were acquainted with the worst practices of the heathens, but refined upon them, and became teachers of professed idolatries in these infamous mysteries. The word rendered trimmest, is, literally, makest good, which some understand of their plausibly excusing their conduct; though they were so notoriously wicked. They had also shed the innocent blood, both of their children which they sacrificed to Moloch; of the prophets who reproved them for their sins; and of the Lord's decided worshippers: and these abominations were not committed in secret, or carefully concealed; but the marks of them were evidently to be seen on the skirts of their garments, and their guilt defiled every thing they did. Yet they would still persist in justifying themselves; and they had a presumptuous confidence in God, as if he were or soon would be reconciled to them. But he would "enter into judgment with them," or denounce sentence against them, on that very account: for in saying that they had not sinned, they affronted the God of truth in the grossest manner, (1 John i. 10.) It was also undeniable, that they had not renounced their idolatrous connexions and confidences, but now expected help from Egypt, as they formerly had done from Assyria; and resembled an adulterous woman, that gads about from one paramour to another. Therefore the Lord was determined to put them to shame: and they should go forth from Pharaoh, with every expression of disconsolation; nay, they should go into captivity in the deepest distress and anguish: for the Lord was displeased with their confidence, and had determined never to prosper them in their evil ways. The alliances of the Jews with Assyria had always proved ruinous and disgraceful: and the Egyptians slew Josiah, carried Jehoahaz prisoner into Egypt, and utterly disappointed all the expectations of the Jews.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.
V. 1—13.

The Lord will remind us of all the favours that he hath conferred on us from our youth; and of all our professions of faith and love, since we first heard of his name and salvation. It is very desirable and honourable to be early numbered amongst his worshippers, and admitted to those sacred ordinances, which are as the solemn espousals of the soul to God, (Note, Cant. iii. 11.) Yet numbers on such occasions express much zeal and love, and appear ready to follow him through every trial and difficulty, who afterwards give cause to suspect, that their affections were only moved, and not their hearts changed; and that they had no root in themselves, and therefore in time of temptation fell away. Many, who once appeared to be "holiness to the LORD," and devoted to his service, spend their future lives in such a manner, that their zealous professions are an additional reproach to their characters, and an aggravation of their crimes. Yet some, who have fallen off, after very promising beginnings, and who have run very wide in the ways of impiety or infidelity, have been recovered, and have remembered the love of their first espousals, and their subsequent unfaithfulness; to their deeper humiliation before God even to the end of their lives. But not only hypocrites, and such persons as disgrace their profession, are criminal in these things: even true believers are often constrained to plead guilty. After having been delivered from the bondage of Satan, relieved in the hour of distress and dismay, conducted through many dangers and perplexities, and made comfortable in the hopes and earnests of heavenly felicity; they have evidently made unsuitable returns for these immense obligations; and have declined from that zeal and love which marked their first entrance on a religious course. We all ought, therefore, to examine ourselves in these things, that we may "repent and do our first works," and we should be very careful, as we proceed in life, that we do not lose in zeal and fervency, what we gain in knowledge, prudence, and experience. They, however, who are indeed "holiness to the LORD," and the first fruits of his creatures, (James i. 18;) and who are following him through this dreary wilderness, to the promised rest, experience such love from him, as richly compensates all they can lose, leave, or suffer for his sake: and the Lord will resent the wrong done to such endeared relations, as if done to himself. No apostate or backslider can give a good reason for going far from God: none can charge Him with unfaithfulness, injustice, or unkindness; and he may justly reproach them with the folly, as well as the ingratitude, of leaving such a tried and powerful Friend, to walk after vanity and become vain. —In nations that have been most highly favoured with temporal deliverances and advantages, and with abundance of the means of grace, how grievously do men generally defile themselves and their land, and make the Lord's heritage an abomination! Too often the ministers of religion are peculiarly criminal: men officiate in holy things, without the spiritual knowledge of God or earnest inquiry after him; they presume for lucre to handle the law, without any

CHAP. III.

God invites Judah to return to him, with intimations of mercy, rebukes, and expostulations, 1—5. Israel, though rejected for sin, is less criminal than Judah, who had not profited by the judgments inflicted on Israel, 6—11. Both are called to repentance, with gracious promises, and predictions, 12—19. The people being sharply reproved, are prophetically represented as repenting and confessing their sins, 20—25.

acquaintance with the Lawgiver; and thus pastors, and teachers, and rulers, by their example and doctrine, propagate iniquity, infidelity, and heresy, and harden the hearts of those numbers that walk after such things as cannot profit! What will such men say, when the Lord shall plead against them? And how can they endure the thought of treasuring up judgments even for their children's children? Men, that have been educated in any false religion, adhere tenaciously to it, and are hardly persuaded to change it, however absurd and unreasonable it be. Thus Satan rivets the fetters of ignorance and delusion on men's minds, by means of their bigotry, prejudice, and pride. But the professors of true religion have ever shown a strange propensity to change their glory for any worthless superstition or absurdity; so that the truth and spiritual worship of God cannot be maintained among men, without continual divine interpositions. This is most lamentable, and may well excite our grief and consternation: but our astonishment will be diminished, if we duly consider, "that the "carnal mind is enmity against God," and must therefore naturally prefer any gross or sensual worship, any proud self-exalting reasonings, any absurd superstitions or fanatical chimeras, to the holy character and precepts, the humbling truths and spiritual worship, of the Lord. Indeed we all are prone to commit the two evils, of which Israel was proved guilty. How do we forsake the pure joys of God's favour and service, for the polluting and wasting pleasures and interests of the world and sin! How apt are we to refuse the glorious salvation of Christ, and to prefer our own foolish ways of recommending ourselves to our offended Creator! How prone are we to forsake the unerring word of God to follow human teachers, and the traditions of men, and to forego the consolations of the Holy Spirit, for the worthless joys of the enthusiast and hypocrite! With great labour do men frame and resort to these broken cisterns; instead of drawing the waters of life from the wells of salvation. Thus man became, and thus sinners continue, the slaves of sin and Satan.

V. 14—24.

Even the professed people of God are sometimes reduced to a base and ruinous subjection by their own lusts; but what hath a Christian to do, in the ways of forbidden pleasure and vain dissipation, or in the pursuits of avarice or ambition? Can the waters of these rivers be equal to those of "the River whose streams make glad "the city of God?" If men will thus turn aside, their backslidings will correct them, and they will learn the evil of their conduct, by the bitterness of its consequences, that they may be taught to "be in the fear of the LORD all the day "long." The history of the world, and of the Church, and that of every man, (believer or unbeliever,) proves the total depravity of the human heart: no obligations, professions, pious ancestors, good education, or external means, can ensure any man's continuance in the ways of godliness: no ingenuity or eloquence can extenuate this matter: though men wash themselves with nitre and take much soap, yet their iniquities are marked before God, and will prove their depravity, when produced against them at the day of judgment. The fact is evident and very affecting, that the descendants of the most pious men, who have seemed to be planted a noble vine, wholly a right seed, have in many cases degenerated, and become hardened infidels or profligates. But a disposition to self-justification is strongly marked as a feature of man's character: when his criminality cannot be denied, he will vindicate or excuse it; and if he can plead not guilty of one gross outward wickedness, he will deem this a compensation for all other offences: nay, a short-lived reluctant abstaining from some habitual sin, shall be pleaded as an atonement for all former indulgences, and even as an excuse for returning to the commission of it! But when the Lord shall cause men to review their ways, and to know and see what they have done, "every mouth will be stopped, and all the world will "be found guilty before him." Indeed they are often as much under the power of their lusts, and as regardless of consequences in gratifying their present inclinations, as the brute beasts; and as inaccessible to arguments, warnings, or motives, when urged against their impetuous cravings. It is in vain in such cases to weary ourselves about them: the only hope is, that the painful effects of their vices will lead them to salutary reflection, or give us a future opportunity of suggesting useful admonitions.

V. 25—37.

Sometimes despair of mercy, or of victory over domineering evil habits and lusts, leads men to as unrestrained indulgence, as the most presumptuous infidelity could do. They think there is no hope for them, and as they have loved their sinful pleasures, they may as well go on in them as not! To this case the abundant mercy and almighty assistance, proposed in the Gospel, form a suitable remedy. —Sinners of every rank and description must all stand before the Judge of the world; and most of them are conscious, that they cannot vindicate their conduct before him: then they will appear like the poor convict before the bar, when he stands to hear the ignominious sentence against him for his crimes. Even kings, princes, priests, and prophets, will be thus put to shame before the assembled world: and the unreasonableness of men's conduct, whether they have been idolatrous infiels or profane, will as much shame their understandings as their hearts. It may be vain to expect help from God in the time of trouble, if we now turn our backs on him: yet many call upon him, when they think death at hand, who have never before regarded him. And as the Lord will not help the perishing sinner who continues to the last impenitent; so all his other confidences will fail him, how many soever they may have been. This will be the awful case of those especially, who have hardened themselves against convictions and reproofs, and who have hated and persecuted such as have warned and instructed them. Men do not forsake God, merely because they suppose his service is unprofitable or injurious, but because they are of a proud independent spirit, which scorns subjection and subordination; and because they desire to be lords, they will come no more unto him: in this manner they forsake their honour, privilege, interest, and happiness; and thus we have all too often, and too long, forgotten and neglected him. Men may employ all their ingenuity and application in the cause of impiety: but they can find no happiness in it; they may teach other wicked ones their way, and thus be accessaries to their destruction; they may do much mischief, and thus treasure up wrath against the day of wrath; they may varnish the matter over with fair pretences, and shift from one sin to another, and seek safety and happiness by varied means: but confusion is their portion, "the LORD hath "rejected their confidences, and they shall not prosper in "them."

NOTES.

CHAP. III. V. 1. The beginning of this chapter, in the original, seems to connect with the conclusion of the preceding. "In saying if a man," &c. God would never prosper his professed worshippers, while they proceeded in their evil courses: and this appeared, not only by his threatenings and judgments, but even by his calls to repentance and promises of mercy. For in saying 'Return to me, and I will pardon thee, notwithstanding thy 'past atrocious crimes,' he in effect said, that he would not otherwise pardon them. To show that his ways and thoughts are unspeakably above those of man; he illustrates the subject from the law given by Moses; in which any one who had divorced his wife, was forbidden to take her back, if she had been married to another (Note. Deut. xxiv. 1—4:) and it must be allowed, that such a conduct would introduce a community of wives; and greatly pollute the land where it was practised: yet after all the idolatries committed by the Jews, the Lord could honourably, and would certainly, receive them to full favour, if they returned to him.

V. 2, 3. The people might see the traces of their idolatries on every high place on which they looked: they were continually devising new species of idolatry, and tempting others to it; even as the prostitute sits by the way to seduce the passengers, or as the Arabian robber waits in the desert for the traveller. Thus they polluted the land by their abominable wickedness: and when the Lord visited them with drought or famine, they persisted in their crimes with the most shameless effrontery.

V. 4, 5. Some interpret these verses as a reproof of the hypocrisy and presumption of the Jews. Notwithstanding their abandoned and obstinate wickedness, they would still pretend to call God their Father and the Guide of their youth; (Note, Prov. ii. 17;) the Friend, who had taken care of the nation from its infancy: and they presumed to expect help from him, though they continued to imitate the rebellious son, or the adulterous wife. Nor would they be induced to believe, that he would so reserve his anger for ever, as to bring his threatened judgments upon them; but they expected that he would relent before matters came to this extremity; though they were conscious, that they spake and did evil to the extent of their ability, and were not restrained from transgression by any other hinderance, than want of power or opportunity. This is a probable interpretation; but the passage is more commonly understood in a contrary sense. Would not the people, from this time, (when they were warned, corrected, and invited to repentance, and favoured with such a pious reforming king,) come and seek mercy from that God who had always been the Father and Guide of Israel? Would they not crave him again to take them under his fatherly guidance? And would they not do it immediately, without further delay? And would the Lord, in that case, reserve his anger for ever, and punish them to the end? By no means: though they had done all in their power to provoke him, he was yet disposed to be merciful to them.

V. 6—11. A new message seems to be begun in this place, which probably was delivered after Josiah had made great progress in his reformation. The prophet had a view given him of the wickedness of backsliding Israel, which had apostatized from God, or the kingdom of the ten tribes. The word backsliding seems to be taken from the oxen, when they turned back, instead of drawing forward, in the yoke; and it is used for an individual or a people, renouncing the worship and service of God. Israel had utterly renounced the temple, and almost wholly forsaken the worship of God, and they committed idolatry in every part of the land. The Lord had also sent Elijah, Elisha, and other prophets, to bring them back to him; but in general they returned not. The kingdom of Judah, descended from the same stock, was equally treacherous and unfaithful to the covenant of God with them, and they witnessed all these transactions. At length he saw it necessary to put Israel away, as an adulterous woman; which he did by the kings of Assyria. Yet Judah took not warning, and was not afraid to continue, and to grow more impudent, in their abominable and absurd idolatries. And after all that Judah had heard and witnessed of the long continued captivity and misery of Israel, they did not fall in cordially with good Josiah's reformation, but only feignedly, reluctantly, and hypocritically. So that, all things considered, Israel was not so inexcusable as Judah was become: for Judah had been favoured with many pious kings, had had far greater advantages than Israel, had been borne with in greater patience, and had the doom of Israel set before them as a warning; and all these circumstances aggravated their guilt.

V. 12—15. The prophet was next ordered to proclaim his message towards the north, where the ten tribes were dispersed in captivity. We need not suppose that the prophet went into those countries to preach to the Israelites: but this order was intended to shame the Jews, and it implied that mercy was in reserve for Israel. They were thus called on to repent of their idolatries, and return to the Lord: and he would no longer cause his anger to rest upon them, being ever disposed to mercy. They were exhorted to acknowledge that they had sinned against that God, whose professed and covenanted worshippers they had been; and that they had basely turned every way to seek out other objects of worship, which they preferred to him. They were encouraged to repent and return to God, by an intimation that he still considered them as children, though rebellious, and as married to him, though adulterous; and that he had yet a favour towards them, on account of his ancient transactions with their nation: they were to be assured, that he intended to take a small remnant of them, as one from the whole number of the inhabitants of a city, or two from a family, or subordinate division of a tribe; to bring them back to Zion, and place over them rulers and teachers like David, men after his own heart, who should feed them wisely and prudently, or with divine knowledge and wisdom, which are the proper food of the soul. This was in part accomplished, when some of the Israelites returned with the Jews from Babylon, and were ruled and taught with them by Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, Nehemiah, and others. But it especially refers to the gathering of the dispersed Israelites with the Gentiles, into the Christian Church in the primitive times and in after ages.
